THE NEW YEAR comes in—the eighth since the World War was officially ended—with scores of men behind the bars in this democracy of ours for their opinions; whatever law they are alleged to have broken their actual offense is their political or industrial faith. A first charge in 1926 upon all believers in the liberty proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence should be the freeing of these victims and the repeal of the laws that are used to justify their imprisonment. The largest number of such prisoners is in California, but there are small groups elsewhere. In jail in Texas, for instance, are five Mexicans and one American, Charles Cline, whose incarceration antedates the World War. Jesus Rangel was engaged in 1913 in organizing armed bands in Texas and conducting them across the Mexican border in the interest of the revolutionary movement. After a fight between his band and a sheriff's posse one of the latter's assistants was found dead from bullets. Rangel's party was pursued and captured and, although no one in it could be directly identified as the slayer, Rangel and five others were sentenced to the penitentiary for life—largely, it is thought, through Diaz's influence. Their only certain crime was violation of the neutrality laws, and in any event they have suffered enough even if guilty of the more serious offense. Labor bodies in Texas are asking for the release of the six men, and we hope they will be backed by petitions to Governor Ferguson from labor and liberal organizations generally.

MOST UNFORTUNATE is the verdict of the International Commission which investigated the Shanghai police murders of May 30. A majority, the British and Japanese members, has upheld the police. The American member, we are happy to report, decided that the police officials failed to appreciate the gravity of the situation and to take proper precautions, as a result of which innocent lives were lost. How any other verdict could have been reached in the light of the evidence presented is beyond us. Fortunately this mixed decision has resulted in the resignation of the police commissioner and of the guilty inspector of police, Everson, who gave no adequate warning to the crowd and ordered it to disperse in tones that could not be heard a few yards away—it will be remembered that a number of the victims were shot in the back. While the prompt acceptance of the resignations of these officials will help to offset the majority decision, so far as the Chinese are concerned the verdict will do much harm. It will confirm them in their view that the foreigners propose to stand by each other at any cost and will increase the bitterness of those who know that the Shanghai massacre was as needless as that at Amritsar.

JAPANESE STUDENTS do not, like their Chinese brothers, overturn governments, but they object to wasting time in military training and demand the right to do their own reading and think their own thoughts. An idiotic teacher of military training in the Otaro Commercial School in mid-October offered his students an examination paper requesting them to outline a plan for student mobilization in case Koreans and anarchists should attack the Government after an earthquake. Naturally the students protested; many of them were Koreans, and all recalled the gruesome events that followed the great Tokio earthquake when wild rumors of Korean plots led to a kind of pogrom. A student campaign against military training is sweeping Japan. Tokio Imperial University, once deemed a stronghold of conservatism, today puts its academic halls at the disposal of the protesting students, and most of the universities have been as wise. But Fukuoka High School in Tokio discharged four students for too vigorous expression of their sympathy with radicals, followed by hissing of Dr. Ninigawa, a government supporter who tried to tell them that American students were eager for military training. The students have founded a National Federation Opposed to Military Training in the Colleges, which sent a delegation, representing six universities, to call upon the Minister of Education; he did not meet them, but the police did, and a riot ensued. At Kioto the police rounded up thirty students who were members of a Social Research Society and had in their possession mimeographed copies of a Russian speech about Lenin. There, however, the university authorities, and even the governor of the prefecture, objected to the illegal invasion of the student dormitories, and an amusing incident occurred when one of the students turned out to be of the royal blood, which meant that the police had to petition the Mikado for permission to arrest him.

IT IS A PLEASURE to record the fact that Lady Gladstone, Gilbert Murray, George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, Muirhead Bone, St. John Ervine, Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, Julian Huxley, Israel Zangwill, and ninety-one other prominent English men and women have signed a petition to their government in England to eliminate Articles 227 and 231 from the Treaty of Versailles, the articles in which Germany acknowledged guilt for bringing on the war and confessed to having committed grave offenses against international morality, the sanctity of treaties, and the customs of war. Says the petition: "We regard these two articles, which were forcibly imposed upon a defeated nation under the most terrible stress, as having expressed a state of mind in the Allied and Associated Powers which has now largely passed away. We believe that they are manifestly unjust and constitute a grave obstacle to international understanding." The committee states that its action is in response to a similar petition signed last spring by more than one hundred persons of eminence in France. We cannot imagine a better manifestation of the Christmas spirit than this, and we are confident in our belief that the wishes of these just and generous English and French people will find their fulfilment in the course of the next few years. We are gratified also to be able to announce the establishment of a French weekly journal to be edited by Victor Margueritte, Baron Baudran, Professor Ebray, and other Frenchmen for the similar purpose of undoing the wrong to Germany by clearing her of the accusation of sole guilt and of immoral war practices, most of which have been exploded like the Charteris falsehood that the Germans boiled the bodies of their dead for fat.

From such reports as reach me there are indications that more authority should be given to the Governor General, so that he will not be so dependent upon the local legislative body to render effective our efforts to set an example of the sound administration and good government which is so necessary for the preparation of the Philippine people for self-government under ultimate independence. If they are to be trained in these arts, it is our duty to provide for them the best that there is.

WE HAVE REPRINTED this passage relating to the Philippines from President Coolidge's message to Congress because it is such a perfect illustration of the muddiness of the thinking now being done in the White House. Please notice that the President says that more authority should be given to the Governor General. He declares that the Governor General should not be so dependent upon the local legislative body. Why? Why, because he wishes to further the "preparation of the Filipinos for self-government." Now, how in the world are they going to learn to govern themselves if they are not given a chance to do so, and are to have a satrap placed over them who shall be independent of the local legislature? The child is to learn to walk under our tutelage. Before letting him do that we are going to tie him down firmly in his cradle. The truth is that General Wood does not like the child's growing pains and therefore the country is asked not to stick to its historic belief that bad government when self-government is better than good government when imposed from overseas. If we are going to wait until the Filipinos learn to govern themselves precisely as we want them to—and enforce their laws as effectively as we do the Prohibition Amendment, let us say—we shall never redeem our sacred pledge to give them their freedom. Neither General Wood nor Mr. Coolidge desires that we do so.

"THE SENATE IS UNFAIR to Organized Labor." On December 17 the Senate of the Washington State Legislature defeated a bill modeled after the federal Clayton act permitting peaceful picketing. On December 18 a sign with the above words emblazoned upon it was borne by a silent marching picket, who circled the State Capitol buildings and walked the streets of Olympia all day—the answer of the State Federation of Labor to the action of the Senate. The defeated measure would have curtailed the power of State courts in granting injunctions in labor disputes and would also have preserved for labor the right of peaceful picketing in case of strikes except when irreparable damage was done to property. The type of picketing which the Senate was asked to legalize was defined as "allowing one person to walk in front of an establishment not employing union help with a sign or banner stating the place was unfair." The type of picketing to which the Senate was subjected was strictly within the limits of this definition. And the legislature exhibited no desire to test the legality of the picketing, even though it had refused the night before to give legislative sanction to just such actions. Reprisals, however, are expected. All labor bills, it is now definitely threatened by many Senators, will be summarily killed, "to punish labor for this indignity."

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America has concluded a most interesting session in Detroit. Representing twenty-eight constituent Protestant denominations this governing committee has reaffirmed its "unequivocal support of national prohibition." This does not mean that it has discarded the report issued by its department of research upon the failure to enforce the prohibition law. It is willing to face the facts of the situation as they are, but reaffirms its belief that despite all shortcomings the net effect upon the physical, economic, political, and moral life of the nation is beneficial. The committee came out against the Japanese Exclusion Law, which it declares has lost to America the friendship of the Japanese and all the other Oriental people, and "carries in it the seeds of a color war." As to the vital question of peace, it reaffirmed the conclusions of the National Study Conference, held in Washington, December 1 to 3, under the auspices of the Federal Council, which declared war to be the "supreme enemy of mankind" and its continuance "the suicide of civilization." The conference voted that the church should devote itself to peace above all else, that in doing so it should never "become an agent of the government in any activity alien to the spirit of Christ," and should recognize the right of each individual to follow the dictates of his own conscience as to whether he should or should not participate in war. This spells real progress; it is a triumph of the principle of conscientious objection to war, and it has brought the church a step nearer to the ultimate position which it must take or perish—that it will not support its government if that government goes into war. We regret to have to add that the executive committee in Detroit voted to continue to approve the system of supplying chaplains to the army. Why not to the brothel and to the saloon, since these are only lesser evils and not the "supreme enemy of mankind"?

MISSISSIPPI, not content with being the only State that burned a Negro alive last year, has further added to her distinction by lynching a Negro after he had been lawfully tried and acquitted of the murder of a plantation store-manager. But Mississippi is trying to clean house. The sheriff and three deputies have been indicted for this latest outrage, and a pamphlet recently issued by Mississippians active in political life, including the Governor and other State officials, the president of the Bar Association and outstanding members of that group, and the editors of various newspapers, sets forth the case against lynching and against Mississippi in forthright terms. Reviewing the shocking and almost incredible total of 530 lynchings in the State during the last forty years, the pamphlet lays the blame for this lawlessness exactly where it belongs—on the shoulders of the men sworn to uphold the law, the sheriffs who gave up their prisoners to a mob, the deputies who did not use the weapons the law gave them the right to use in defense of accused persons in their custody. The pamphlet says further that members of a mob are cowards who always cringe before any show of force by those in authority; that they would refrain from participating in a lawless enterprise if they believed that they were running the slightest risk either of punishment or personal injury. These things have been amply demonstrated in scores of attempted lynchings, even in Mississippi, when sheriffs and deputies who were not also cowards have stood up and defended their prisoners with their own lives. In no case is there a record of an officer of the law who was killed in thus performing his duty. And if, combined with a determined sheriff, there was in every county in which a lynching threatened a determined judge who would send to jail the members of a mob, Mississippi would not have had six lynchings last year.

“NOW BE AN AMERICAN. Our men only last about six months in England and then they become Anglicized.” This, says Bainbridge Colby, ex-Secretary of State, in the Saturday Review, was the instruction given to him by Woodrow Wilson when he went to England during the war on an official mission. Mr. Colby continues:

The President referred to that subtle and encompassing and penetrating charm which is English. I think Page fell a victim to it. He took absolutely the English view of the controversies that arose during the war about our neutral rights. He saw with the vividness of close proximity the great issue of freedom as opposed to autocracy. It impaired his intellectual refraction. It distorted the angles of his vision. His sincerity is beyond question and his popular success in England was unmistakable, but he had ceased to be a serviceable spokesman of the President or a dependable ambassador of the United States.

Mr. Colby says Colonel House was sent on his unofficial missions simply and solely because Mr. Page had thus become Anglicized. “Hence,” writes Mr. Colby, “the estrangement of Page from the President—and a presidential silence that was considerate but knowing, followed by a course that was independent of his ambassador but right.” It was an extraordinary thing about Mr. Wilson’s administration that he was bitterly dissatisfied with his three leading ambassadors, Page, Gerard, and Penfield, as he was with several members of his Cabinet. But he could never bring himself to ask for the resignation of anyone whom he had appointed, no matter how great a failure the man became.

Cut It Short

A FEW years ago some editorial genius discovered that Americans no longer have time to read. The vogue of the short story and the popularity of the one-reel movie were pointed to for confirmation, and thus the legend was launched. Now Mr. Cosmo Hamilton predicts that the novel will persist only in the form of a fifteen-minute summary to be given over the radio, and that section of the public which never reads anything anyway is prepared to take him seriously. Condensation, they say, is part of the spirit of the age, and where, they ask, is the Victorian novel of eight or nine hundred pages?

But the answer, the proof that Americans take the time for something which cannot be finished while swallowing the matutinal coffee or while riding in the subway to work, is furnished by the catalogues of the publishers Mr. Dreiser having won some fame with a book like “The Genius” has just published a trifle in two fat volumes, the most-talked-of contemporary novel. Proust’s “Memory of Things Past” is appearing in instalments which will total some six thousand pages, while writers like Romain Rolland, Martin Anderson Nexö, and Ladislav Reymont confine themselves to a modest four volumes for each single work. The three volumes of Galsworthy’s “Forsyte Saga” and the three volumes of Bennett’s “Clayhanger” series have also found readers, and when it is remembered that many persons are not only familiar with the books just mentioned but have some acquaintance also with such opuscles as the three volumes of Westermarck’s “History of Human Marriage,” the six volumes of Havelock Ellis’s “Studies in the Psychology of Sex,” and the twelve volumes of “The Golden Bough,” it is obvious that the habit of sustained reading is not lost. We say whoever will not listen to our characteristic national injunction, “Make it snappy,” gets no hearing. Yet James Joyce, for example, refused to “cut it short,” and it cannot be said that he has been completely neglected in consequence.

Is it not possible that Mr. Hamilton is basing his conviction that people will no longer read novels upon insufficient evidence, merely upon the fact that they will no longer read his novels? Is it not true that even today we can stand a good deal of a thing if it happens to be good? Certainly a bad novel cannot be too short, and from what we have read of Mr. Hamilton we see no reason to suppose that fifteen minutes is not enough for him; but though we always feel strangely busy when one of his works comes around, we generally manage to find, merely by accident no doubt, that some hours of leisure appear when even the longer works of certain other writers are at hand. The length of a novel is not, after all, to be measured by the clock but by the mind, and we have known mere novelettes which seemed, and thus psychologically were, a good deal longer than all Proust.

No man in his right mind would rather read two bad novels than one good one. If Dickens is less read today than fifty years ago, length has nothing to do with the fact, for those who do not read him fail to do so only because they find that he has less to say to them than certain other writers. There are novels which are badly proportioned and there are novels which exhaust their material before they reach the end, but there is no such thing as a good book which is merely “too long.”

Are Booms a Blessing?

THE Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has announced that it will lend no more money for the construction of office buildings and high-class apartment houses in New York City. Such structures, the company says, are being overproduced, with the result that the building industry is "on the edge of disaster." Certainly the city is in the throes of an unprecedented building boom. One after another of the old historical landmarks in the uptown business district—Delmonico's, Madison Square Garden—are coming down, and in their place rise towering steel and concrete office buildings; while Park Avenue extends its massive cheese boxes ever north and north. Men toil all night under electric suns, no sidewalk is without its wooden tunnel, the seething streets are further blocked with truckloads of brick and tile and steel.

Amidst all the appearances of such abounding prosperity the edict of the Metropolitan comes like a bombshell. The boom in building has created more rental space than a profitable traffic in rents will sustain, and it has invited into the mortgage business a new and dubious variety of finance company. The old-line companies—like the Metropolitan—have continued to lend on first mortgages up to a maximum of two-thirds the conservatively appraised value of the property, and have stuck to a moderate return. With the growth of the boom and the increased demand for construction loans, newcomers—not seasoned bankers but high-pressure salesmen—have appeared. Their gaudy circulars and their super-salesmen announce their bonds to be secured by first mortgages on high-class real estate. They often get the money before a spade is turned on the building. Thus the investor has no security at all at the start. They then proceed to give the building a good, generous appraisal and lend up to 80, 90, and 100 per cent of it.

Why? Because the bigger the loan, the bigger the bonus and the commission. "If a mortgage company is organized by expert selling men, with excessive expenses for advertising, salesmen, office, and overhead charges, a pressure to get large commissions ensues." Commissions run from 10 to 15 per cent of the sum loaned. The sole asset is the overappraised building, mortgaged up to the hilt on the boom scale of rentals. When the boom finally depresses rentals, and the movement has already started, the gullible investor is going to have some lovely new wall paper—steel engraved. By which time, the promoters will be exercising their talents in another—and distant—building boom. Or riding surf-boards in Florida.

The deeper social issues the Metropolitan fails to develop, though it does say tersely enough that the "housing situation is still acute for apartments renting for less than $15 per room per month." Which means that it is still acute for 95 per cent of the population of New York City. While capital has been pouring into office buildings and Pekinese apartment houses, the industrial worker and the clerk are paying more for increasingly cramped quarters. Because their purchasing power has been restricted by low wages, enormous corporate profits have been accumulated. These profits, seeking investment, flow into unneeded construction, into commercial space that presently cannot be adequately rented and used. Space for the ordinary man's home does not enter into the calculation—he cannot pay enough in rent to magnetize the necessary capital. Meanwhile, these new lofts and office buildings—twenty stories replacing a demolished six—put an ever-increasing strain upon streets and subways already intolerably congested.

Which illustrates again, and poignantly, the blessings of untrammelled competition.

Please Pass the Sugar

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S "utmost solicitude" for the beet-sugar industry, of which he spoke when he refused to reduce the exorbitant tariff on this necessary, was mainly, he assured us, for the farmer who grows sugar beets. Let us see what the beet-growing farmer gets from this tariff. He urges that it be maintained, in the sincere belief that he is a beneficiary. He has now entered into a contract with the manufacturers which is represented to him, and to the public, as a "partnership"; as a "cooperative," a "profit-sharing" enterprise. Conceding that in certain exceptional circumstances he may benefit from the tariff, if he is being hoodwinked about this contract he is entitled to know it.

Only a little more than one-sixth of the sugar we consumed in 1924 came from beets, but of that fraction nearly three-fourths was produced in the six States of Utah, Idaho, Colorado, Nebraska, Wyoming, and Montana. The present contract prevailing there gives to the farmer a minimum guaranty of $6 a ton for beets measuring up to a certain grade, with provision for a higher price if the sugar content is higher, as it usually is. It is further provided that if the average net price obtained by the factory is more than five cents a pound, the farmer is to get a dollar a ton for each penny above the nickel a pound.

Every beet-growing farmer may well consider what is meant by net price. In his case it means that, if the price paid to the factory is more than a nickel, there must be deducted such items as freight charges, cash discounts, insurance, taxes, storage, handling charges, sales costs, advertising, telegraph tolls, traveling expenses, brokerage, and so on; and these amount to about a penny a pound. As a fact the farmer doesn't figure in the deal unless the gross selling price is more than six cents a pound. These Western factories, moreover, count in against the farmer an imaginary freight rate from the coast, just as they milk the local consumer for fictitious transportation.

Recently the farmers in the six States mentioned were receiving about $7.50 a ton for beets of record-breaking sugar content. It is the fortuitous excellence of the crop, not the tariff, which is helping them out, whatever the manufacturers may tell them. But, even if they manage by intensive cultivation to maintain an average production of eleven tons an acre, their expenses of production will still be greater than what the manufacturers allow them. They receive $82.50 an acre for the beets, but the United States Department of Agriculture (Bulletin 917) states that the average cost of production for an eleven-ton acre is $86.95, even though only $1.70 is allowed for taxes and insurance and thirty cents an hour for labor. The farmer is out of pocket $4.45 per acre and his workers get only $2.40 on the basis of an eight-hour day. Even with an unprecedented crop, paying sweatshop wages, the farmer is losing money. Apparently he does not know how to keep books.

How are the manufacturers making out? They get their two cents tariff pap on every pound of sugar sold, whatever the price. If sugar is retailing at five cents a pound, it means that the consumer—including the beet-growing farmer—is paying a nickel for three-cent sugar. The manufacturers profit, to the tune of eighty millions a year, from the sugar tariff; and mainly the profiteers are the Western beet-sugar barons, for these six States are the stronghold of this protected industry.

Let us consider one company in this territory. The Great Western (beet) Sugar Company, operating seventeen factories distributed through Colorado, Nebraska, Montana, and Wyoming, produces about two-fifths of our beet sugar. It has $15,000,000 of preferred stock, but has sold only $13,630,000 of it, and this sum represents its total actual investment. On its preferred it pays 7 per cent, and on its common stock—all of which is water—it pays 32 per cent a year. Its actual profits, over and above its investment twenty years ago, have been $134,646,235. On its watered common stock alone it has disbursed about fifty-three millions, while its investment was less than fifteen.

William L. Petriken, the president of this flourishing concern, sat as a delegate at the convention which nominated Calvin Coolidge. Charles W. Waterman, one of its lobbyists and the preconvention manager of Mr. Coolidge's campaign in Colorado, sat as a delegate-at-large from that State. Not so very long ago the President appointed Mr. Waterman counsel for the federal Oil Conservation Board.

We may well put these facts into a picture: the farmers, who are being cheated and deceived; the laborers, who are getting paltry wages; and the Great Western, with its lobbyist in executive favor and its fabulous profits. Looking at this picture, anyone of the consumers (who are paying $200,000 a day on account of the President's refusal to reduce the sugar tariff) may decide for himself the source of Mr. Coolidge's "utmost solicitude."

The New World Court

By WILLIAM HARD

I. As Sham

I CONTEND that our proposed entrance into the new Permanent Court of International Justice is a sham on peace. I contend further that it is a trap through which we unknowingly shall be dropped into the special "sanctions" of the League of Nations and into the special wars of Europe. I contend, thirdly, that it is a derailment device by which the United States will be disastrously diverted from its proper mission of establishing a peace system upon an American basis in its own regions of special authority and of special responsibility.

In this article I shall endeavor to show why I contend that our proposed entrance into the Court is a sham on peace.

We already, on our statute-books, have three installations of general peace machinery. We have a membership in the old Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague. We have a set of arbitration treaties named after Elihu Root. And we have a set of conciliation treaties named after William Jennings Bryan.

The religious periodical called the Christian Century, of Chicago, has repeatedly inquired:

What dispute of ours is there, actual or potential, which we would not wish to take to the old Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague but which we would be willing to take to the new Permanent Court of International Justice at the Hague?

That question has never been answered. It cannot be answered. There are two reasons why it cannot be answered. In the first place, as I shall presently show, we shall always, in practice, for all important matters, prefer not the new Court but actually the old one. In the second place, as I shall likewise presently show, we have no official intention of taking any important matters to any court at all. Our President does not say:

Fellow-citizens, I have a grievous dispute with the Haitians regarding our armed occupation of Haiti. I have a grievous dispute with the Mexicans regarding the constitution of Mexico and its effects upon the properties of Americans from the United States in Mexico. I want to send these disputes to a court. I cannot send them to the old Court. The old Court is a poor thing. Give me the new Court. When I have it, I will go to it with these disputes.

Our President says no such thing. He does not mention one dispute, he does not mention one sort of dispute, for which he needs the new Court. That is natural. He does not need it; and, if he had it, he would not go to it on any matter of any genuine importance.

Let us consider such a matter. Let us consider our dispute with Salvador and with Costa Rica regarding our treaty of 1916 with Nicaragua. If there is any dispute of ours which clamors for final and definitive judicial settlement, it is this.

In this dispute we already have one court judgment against us. The Central American Court of Justice held that our treaty with Nicaragua violated the rights of Salvador and of Costa Rica. We had helped to create that court. We were its sponsors. It held against us. It held against us twice. We disregarded its decisions. We refused to obey its decisions. It evaporated. It is no more. Our President does not say:

Fellow-citizens, we have been put into a deplorable position by our refusal to obey the decisions of the Central American Court of Justice. The refusal was inevitable. The Central American Court of Justice was a poor thing. Give me now this new Permanent Court of International Justice at the Hague; and I will go to it with this old legal dispute of ours and get it firmly settled by a good court and good judges.

Our President says no such thing. He does not even say that he would like to get our Senate to accept the poor little optional "compulsory jurisdiction" article—Article 36—of the constitution of the new Permanent Court of International Justice. Some twenty of the smaller countries of the world have accepted that article. It binds them merely to go to the Court with questions of international law, with questions regarding the interpretation of treaties, with questions involving alleged breaches of international obligations. Our President does not beseech us to sign that article. On the contrary, he tells us that one of the merits of this new peace-engine at the Hague is that we can always keep away from it!

Of course! In the matter of definite peace promises, in the matter of definite renunciations of war, we are not going forward. We are going backward. This will appear clearly if we look at the Root arbitration treaties and at the Bryan conciliation treaties.

The Root treaties and the Bryan treaties differ in one crucial respect from membership in the old Permanent Court of Arbitration and from membership in the new Permanent Court of International Justice. Those memberships, existing or proposed, bind us to no actual peace commitment whatsoever. The Root treaties and the Bryan treaties do so bind us. They mean something. It is little, perhaps; but it is something.

The Root treaties bind us in certain circumstances to arbitrate certain disputes of a narrowly limited legal nature. The Bryan treaties bind us to pause from war while a commission of inquiry into a dispute is inquiring and reporting.

The Root treaties were, of course, "the dawn of a new day." The Bryan treaties were, of course, "the dawn of a new day." The old Permanent Court of Arbitration was "the dawn of a new day." Now the new Permanent Court of International Justice is "the dawn of a new day." It is a poor Administration that cannot produce a dawn. And it is also a poor Administration that cannot see to it that the dawns of its predecessors are reduced to being dim and desuetudinous twilights.

We originally signed some nineteen Root treaties. Now our State Department has knowledge of only twelve existing Root treaties. We originally signed some thirty Bryan treaties. Now our State Department has knowledge of only twenty-one existing Bryan treaties.

We do not go ahead and get more of these Root treaties and Bryan treaties, which mean something. We go ahead and get fewer of them.

There are some sixty sovereign countries in the world. The Administration does not say:

We will get Root dawns, we will get Bryan dawns, with all of them. We will in fact produce some super-Root dawns and some super-Bryan dawns for you. These treaties contain actual peace pledges. We will improve those pledges. We will enlarge them. We will make them cover more ground and cover it more bindingly. We are out to give you peace, not a peace-engine which we may or may not use, but peace itself! Peace guaranteed by actual pledged restrictions upon the right to go to war!

Certainly not. Let us again take a definite case. Let us again take the case of Mexico.

Almost continuously ever since Mexico revolted from Spain we have had trouble with Mexico. We have had more trouble with Mexico than with any other country in the world. We forever are hovering on the verge of war with Mexico. We pine for "world courts." We yearn to be of "service" to poor Europe. We cannot lie abed for the twitching in our limbs which bids us up and be doing for the cause of peace in the Mediterranean Sea. What Administration, then, would be so provincial as to give a peace thought and a peace treaty to the valley of the Rio Grande?

We have no Root treaty with Mexico. We have no Bryan treaty with Mexico. All that we have with Mexico, in the way of a system of peace, is Article 21 of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848. By that article the two countries agree to one of the feeblest and one of the least compulsive arbitration commitments known. They agree that if a dispute should arise between them they will "maturely consider whether it would not be better that such difference should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side or by that of a friendly nation." They agree (in other words) not that they will stay at peace but that they will think of staying at peace—a thought which would occur to them in any case anyway.

Such is the sum of our peace system in the quarter in which we most need a peace system. Moreover, it is a smaller sum than once we had. Once we did have a Root arbitration treaty with Mexico. It was signed and ratified in 1908 under Roosevelt. It expired in 1913 under Woodrow Wilson. Mr. Wilson interested himself greatly in Mexico. He sent many marines and many soldiers to Vera Cruz. He did not send them because the Mexicans refused to salute our flag. That is a misunderstanding. The Mexicans agreed to salute our flag. We said that we were willing to return the salute. The Mexicans asked us to sign a paper saying that we would return it. We refused to sign the paper. We were willing to return the salute but not to say in writing that we would return it. Hence our nineteen dead marines at Vera Cruz. Hence the resplendent funeral oration which Mr. Wilson pronounced over their bodies at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, when he said that it was "a proud thing" for them to have died in "a war of service." Hence his subsequent address to Congress in which he said that our friendship toward Mexico would be capable of every "sacrifice." "Service!" "Sacrifice!" But no peace pledge! Mr. Wilson did not renew our Root treaty with Mexico. It has never been renewed.

No! How paltry would it be to present our people with the actuality of peace on the Rio Grande when we can present them with the image, the mimicry, the radiant and empty mirage, of universal peace at the Hague!

It is empty because in fact—as I have intimated, and as I shall now prove—no American President will ever take any important question of ours to the new Permanent Court of International Justice.

Let us imagine that John Jones has been elected President. He was a good mayor of Oskaloosa. He was a good governor of Iowa. So now he is President. He gets into an international dispute. It is important, genuinely. It has to do, let us say, with debts owed to us by foreign governments. It has to do, let us say, with demands of foreign governments that their citizens shall be allowed to migrate into this country. It is not a play dispute. It is a life-and-death dispute.

President John Jones consults his Secretary of State. He learns that we now belong to two courts—to the old Permanent Court of Arbitration and to the new Permanent Court of International Justice. He inquires the difference between them. His Secretary of State informs him.

Under the old Court, out of a long list of potential judges, we Americans choose two actual judges. Our antagonist chooses two. We and our antagonist together choose the fifth judge.

"Then," says the President, "under the old Court I shall have half the power in the naming of the bench. How is it in the new Court?"

"In the new Court," says the Secretary, "we take the judges as we find them."

"Who are they?" says the President.

"I remember," says the Secretary, "that our John Bassett Moore is among them. For the rest I must send for my list from the Department."

He sends for it. It arrives. "Ah, yes," says the Secretary, "I do not know any of the other members of this Court, but their names are: Dionisio Anzilotti, Rafael Altamira y Creves, Bernard Cornelis Johannes Loder, Didrik Galtrup Gjedde Nyholm, Robert Bannatyne Viscount Finlay, Dimitri Negulesco, Hans Max Huber, Charles André Weiss, Yorozu Oda, Michael Yovanovitch, Frederik Valdemar Nikolai Beichmann, Epitacio da Silva Pessoa, Antonio Sanchez de Bustamante y Sirven, Wang Chung-hui."

What will President John Jones do? Remember that it is not any internationalized American inhabitant of European and Asiatic pockets that has been elected President. It is John Jones. It will always be John Jones. What will John Jones do? I know what he will do. If he goes to any court at all, he will run like a rabbit from the new Court; and, like a snail, if at all, he will go inevitably to the old Court.

I, accordingly, do not hesitate to denounce our proposed entrance into this new Court as a triple sham. It is a sham because it is accompanied by an abandonment of the growing lines of binding peace commitments marked out by the Root treaties and the Bryan treaties. It is a sham because it is unaccompanied by any new actual peace commitment of its own. It is a sham because it takes us into a judicial institution to which we will never resort (in any important matter) in preference to another judicial institution to which we already belong.

Then, in addition to being a peace-sham of the greatest possible emptiness, it is a war-trap of the greatest possible effectiveness.

Chaos in France

By ROBERT DELL

[This article was written before the resignation of Louis Loucheur as Minister of Finance. He has since been succeeded by Paul Doumer.]

Paris, December 15

I SHOULD be sorry to risk a prophecy as to whether the present French Government will still be in office when these lines appear in print or, if not, what sort of government will have succeeded to it. After the action of the Finance Committee of the Chamber yesterday in returning M. Loucheur's financial proposals to the Government, the resignation of the latter, or at least of M. Loucheur, was expected. The Finance Committee of the Chamber is right in its main contention, which is that it is useless to increase the rates of the income tax until measures have been taken to insure that the tax is properly levied and collected. For the last six years the officials responsible for the collection of the income tax (contrôleurs des contributions directes) have been demanding such measures. On April 13, 1919, they voted unanimously at the general meeting of their association a resolution declaring that the existing provisions for the assessment and collection of the income tax were inoperative and resulted in an unjust inequality of treatment for taxpayers and a loss of billions a year to the state, and that in these circumstances they repudiated all responsibility for the failure to enforce the tax. They repeated their declarations in 1921, 1923, and 1924, and emphasized them by adding that there was a deliberate campaign to saboter the income tax, with the tacit complicity of the Government, and that this tax alone could procure the necessary financial resources to balance the budget. Finally, on May 16, last, they made a "last appeal" to the country for the strict and legal application of the income tax.

These appeals have up to the present been unheard and that is one of the chief reasons why the French national finances are now in a state of chaos. The present income-tax rates are not low—in the case of small and moderate incomes they are too high. The mischief is that they are not paid, except by persons with salaries who can not escape, because the others do not pay on their real incomes and many never pay at all. The total amount collected on account of direct taxes up to the end of November of this year was only about $260,000,000. In the Figaro the other day M. Coty, after going exhaustively into the matter and quoting figures evidently supplied by the Department of Finance itself, arrived at the conclusion that, if the income tax were properly assessed and collected, its annual yield, at its present rates, would be increased by about $600,000,000. And a deputy for the department of the Nord recently declared that the income tax at its present rates ought to yield in his department alone as much as it now yields in the whole of France.

Plainly it is futile to increase the rates so long as this state of affairs continues. The higher the rates the greater the inducement to fraud, and it is asking too much of human nature to expect the honest minority to go on paying on their real incomes while they see their neighbors defrauding the government with impunity. I know that it will not be easy to find a remedy, for at bottom it is a question of mœurs. Taxation is not the only legal obligation escaped by people in France with influence of their own or influential friends. The French have a passion for equality, but there is not much of it in France. In few countries do more things go by favor. Nevertheless, something would be done by making it compulsory to declare the amount of the income and enacting severe penalties for false declarations. M. Caillaux's original income-tax law, as passed by the Chamber in 1907, included the compulsory declaration, but the Senate, as usual, when it at last consented to pass the law, struck out that provision and made various other amendments that have helped to make the law inoperative.

At this moment it is particularly necessary that the Minister of Finance should be a man enjoying the confidence of the public. The truth is that the first and most essential measure required is the one measure that nobody has the courage to propose—the stabilization of the franc. Until the franc is stabilized the budget cannot be balanced. The budget for 1925 was balanced on paper, but it now shows a large deficit, partly because the taxes have not been collected, partly because of the cost of Morocco and Syria, but also partly because the depreciation of the franc and the consequent rise in paper prices have caused the expenditure to exceed the estimates. Wholesale paper prices were 18 per cent higher at the end of November than at the end of March. Since the direct taxes payable this year were levied, their gold value has been reduced about 25 per cent. Moreover, the wide discrepancy between wholesale and retail prices that inevitably results from a falling currency makes accurate budgeting impossible. At the end of November the general wholesale price index was 618 and the general retail price index only 454. In other words, wholesale gold prices were about 20 per cent higher than in 1914 and retail gold prices about 10 per cent lower. Wholesale prices of course adjust themselves to the exchange much more quickly than retail prices, which will never catch up the former until the franc is stabilized.

There would be no difficulty in stabilizing the franc. It is fear of the inevitable economic crisis that would follow stabilization that makes the politicians hesitate, and of course there are people, as there were in Germany, whose interest it is to keep the currency unstable, or at least they think so, although perhaps ultimately they are mistaken. Sooner or later the franc will have to be stabilized, and, the longer stabilization is postponed, the worse will be its economic consequences. The franc is now beginning to fall regularly every day, and unless immediate measures are taken its fall may become catastrophic.

There is, I fear, little hope that such measures will be taken. I anticipate rather an aggravation of the present chaotic conditions. The chaos is both political and financial. The Cartel des Gauches has gone to pieces and there is no stable majority in Parliament—no party or combination of parties capable of enforcing a policy. All sorts of quack remedies are being suggested—a "Committee of Public Safety," the restoration of the "Sacred Union," a so-called National Government composed of representatives of all parties, and even a dictator. Seeing that the parties of the Left cannot agree on a financial policy, it is hard to see how matters would be improved by putting a political menagerie into power. A "National Government" would arrive at no policy at all. What is needed here is a French Schacht, but he has to be found. If he could be found he should be nominated director of currency and president of the Bank of France with the powers that were given to Dr. Schacht in Germany two years ago. It is indispensable that the necessary measures concerning the currency should be openly discussed and therefore known in advance. For the rest all that is necessary is to impose sufficient taxation to balance the budget and see that it is collected, and that is the business of Parliament. There is no occasion for panic. France is far from being in the situation in which Germany was two years ago. No doubt her prosperity is partly fictitious. The depreciation of the currency has given an artificial impetus to exportation, which is not all to the good, for France is selling cheaply and buying dearly all that she needs from abroad. Nevertheless, both her exports and imports are larger in gold value than before the war, which was, and still is, far from being the case of Germany. Further, France has got rid of four-fifths of her internal debt which, if the franc depreciates much more, will soon be no larger than before the war. In fact, the only really disquieting circumstance is that nobody seems able and willing to take the necessary measures.

There is talk in some quarters of a possible attempt at a coup d'état. I doubt whether such an attempt is likely and still more whether it would succeed, if it were made. Fascism is no doubt increasing among the middle classes, but it has no leader. Moreover, the Fascists and the Royalists of the Action Française are at daggers drawn, so that the forces of reaction are divided. Public opinion is much less affected by the situation than the hysterical articles of certain papers would lead one to suppose. My impression is that the public is to a great extent indifferent and that the real gravity of the situation is not yet fully recognized. I fail to discern the "crisis of confidence" of which we hear so much in the opposition press. Perhaps in a sense there is too much confidence. At least there is too little initiative. Ignorance of financial and economic questions is so general in France, especially in the press, that one cannot expect any pressure from public opinion on the politicians to make them adopt the necessary remedies.

Golden Rule Nash

By ROBERT W. BRUÈRE

WHEN early in the second week of December the news leaked out that Arthur Nash—Golden Rule Nash—President of the A. Nash Company, manufacturers of men's clothing in Cincinnati, was planning to sign up with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, there was a buzz of amused and cynical skepticism among the ranks of the liberal intelligentsia, progressive churchmen, and especially among trade unionists to whom the Golden Rule factory had come to stand as a glorified and Billy-Sundayized version of the "open shop." Most of these skeptics did not know Arthur Nash personally. But for years he had been going about the country to churches, colleges, Rotary and Kiwanis clubs, chambers of commerce, and manufacturers' associations proclaiming his discovery of Jesus as the ideal business man and of the Golden Rule as the solution of all earthly problems, including the problem of employer-employee relationships in industry. He had become one of the best self-advertised small business men in America. Billy Sunday had made much the same circuit before him and had retired to his Western ranch a made man. Golden Rule Nash had begun with a scraped-together capital of $60,000 and in seven years had built up the largest wholesale tailoring business in the country, with a capital of $3,000,000 and a monthly production of more than $1,000,000. He himself refers to his achievement as the "industrial miracle of our age," a description which, though not original with him, he has made his own. In an address before the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration he cited these statistics of financial growth as "the credentials I offer for speaking on this subject." And always he credited his success to the "vision" which had led him to accept it as his mission "to demonstrate the fact that, in the twentieth century of the Christian era, the principles laid down by Jesus of Nazareth could be made to work—work successfully and not merely as a sacrificial ideal—for the mutual well-being of mankind, and to the glory of God."

Mr. Nash was brought up a Seventh Day Adventist. In the days of his youth he was sent to the theological school of that sect in Battle Creek, Michigan. When he had completed his course there he went as instructor to the Seventh Day Adventists' school for ministers and missionaries in Detroit, where some twenty-five young people were preparing to become bearers of the "Third Angel's Message." In his book, "The Golden Rule in Business," he tells how his experiences with the devout and pious brethren drove him to heresy, skepticism, and rebellion. "I did my level best to run away from duty, faith, God, myself. My father strove earnestly with me to recant my heresy, to acknowledge my having turned traitor to the faith of my childhood. . . . For four or five years I wandered about the Middle West doing odd jobs here and there. Often did I go ragged and hungry. During those years I never cared two straws which way a freight train was headed when I climbed into a box-car." Seeking comfort, he turned to Tom Paine, Ingersoll, and others of their school. No one has better reason than Mr. Nash to know why men have grown skeptical of professing Christians who love to pray standing in the synagogue and in the corners of the streets.

The fact remains, however, that he could not have built up so great and prosperous a business in so short a time if the men and women who worked for and with him had not been persuaded of the sincerity of his assurance that he was determined to do unto them as he would have had them do unto him if their positions had been reversed. In 1919 the A. Nash Company was one of the smallest concerns in Cincinnati. Today it employs between three and four thousand workers and has some two thousand salesmen scattered over the country. There has never been a strike in that plant. Repeated efforts to organize it both by the Amalgamated and the United Garment Workers failed. The present enterprise got its real start when during the war Mr. Nash bought out a man who wanted to return to his people in Europe. The shop he took over was a typical sweat-shop; wages were low, working conditions wretched. In the name of the Golden Rule he immediately increased wages, in some cases by 300 per cent at once. In 1919 he moved his factory into a building which until then had been used by the Joe Magnus Whiskey Distillery Company. Two years later, the business requiring more space, he converted the bottling plant of the Moerlein Brewery Company into a clothing factory. These buildings were naturally not well adapted to the purpose. Their provisions for the convenience of the workers, especially their inadequate provisions for women, became the subject of much criticism. Since those days, however, they have been extensively remodeled, so that while they cannot be favorably compared to the best of the modern clothing factories such as those of Holtz & Sons in Rochester, or the newer plants of Hart Schaffner and Marx in Chicago, they are well above the average in the needle trades. Certainly there was no organized disposition on the part of the workers to find fault with them. By stabilizing employment, by making remarkably successful efforts to keep his workers employed the year round—not a mean achievement in the clothing industry—by paying good wages, and maintaining clean and comfortable working conditions Mr. Nash won the loyalty of the rank and file of his employees to an unusual degree.

But his relation to them was a purely personal one. There had been no attempt to organize any system of representative or constitutional government. The theory was that any one who had a grievance could always go directly to him, that any questions of plant policy could be taken up in "town meeting," as the irregular mass meetings inside the workshops were called. As the working force grew in numbers, and more especially as Mr. Nash spent more and more of his time going about the country preaching the Golden Rule and maintaining contact with his sales force, this informal arrangement proved less and less satisfactory. The pastoral relation that had been possible with a few score or even a few hundreds of workers proved cumbersome and inadequate with more than three thousand. As in every growing primitive democracy, groups, cliques, parties began to intervene between the chief shepherd and his flock. Wages like everything else had been subject of individual arrangement. "The workers fix their wages themselves," Mr. Nash used to say. But it was obvious that the foremen and straw bosses had an increasing hand in them. No one outside of the executives knew what the itemized pay roll was; Mr. Nash held that it was a matter of confidence between him and his "fellow-workers." Rumors of favoritism began to spread about. Churchmen as well as trade unionists began to place large question marks against Mr. Nash's assertion that democracy existed in his factory and that in the matter of wages the principle of the Golden Rule was being scrupulously applied.

Precisely what influence the initiation of investigations by churchmen and the renewed activity of trade-union organizers exerted upon his final decision no one, probably not Mr. Nash himself, will ever be able to say. Neither is the question important. No one who was in a position to follow Mr. Nash during the week of December 8 can doubt the sincerity of the decision he then made or the resolute courage with which he put it into effect. Calling his workers together he asked them to join the Amalgamated. "So far as I know," he said, "this is the first time that the head of a great industry has positively and aggressively taken the initiative by not only requesting but urging that all of his workers join in the great organized labor movement." So far as any one who heard him knew, it was the first time. Mr. Nash had not taken his executive staff or his foremen into his confidence in advance of this announcement. Some of them resented this. Some of them were alarmed at the possible effect of the entrance of the union upon their influence and authority over the workers under them. For two days and nights they went about among the workers, haranguing against the union, challenging Mr. Nash's wisdom. It was not until noon of December 10, at a great mass meeting of all the thousands of employees gathered in the Shubert Theater in Cincinnati, that Mr. Nash was able by the most impassioned personal appeal to win a majority, including the leaders of the opposition—among them two vice-presidents—to support his request that the working out of a plan be left to him and President Sidney Hillman of the Amalgamated. And even then he gave his pledge that if after a month or a year they wanted to "throw the union agreement out" they should be free to do so.

Those three days, December 8, 9, 10, were tense with excitement. The workers were confused, many of them struck dumb, by the open division between the foremen and manufacturing executives and Mr. Nash. For forty-eight hours the issue hung in the balance. It was decided not by Mr. Nash's courage and prestige only but also by the sober, decisive, forthright, and able action of Sidney Hillman. Whatever other men said, Sidney Hillman never permitted himself to question Mr. Nash's motives. He met the situation as Mr. Nash had created it, addressed the workers in terms of the Amalgamated's achievements and purposes, went from the mass meeting to the factory, where he won the confidence of the opposing executives, met the foremen and won their promise of cooperation. Here was a job to be done in the interest of the workers, the Amalgamated, the labor movement, and he did it without paralyzing introspection, without letting the grass grow under his feet.

On Friday, December 11, more than seventy of Cincinnati's foremost civic, educational, business, and religious leaders, together with Judge Julian W. Mack of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, gathered at luncheon at the Business Men's Club to honor Mr. Nash and President Hillman for their faith in one another, their faith in democracy, for the fine example they had shown to American industry. Mr. Nash said that he believed the time would come when brotherhood according to the Golden Rule would be enough; that he feared the deadening effect of organization because so often men made it an end in itself instead of a means to an end; but that experience had persuaded him that in the world as it is trade-union organization was an essential means to brotherhood. Sidney Hillman illustrated his declaration that "the work of the organized labor movement as the Amalgamated sees it is to bring the precepts of the Golden Rule into the daily working lives of the masses of men and women."

Judge Mack, a man of deep penetration, a keen, shrewd appraiser of men, appealed to his fellow-citizens to marshal the support of public opinion behind an experiment which he regarded as of the highest promise to American industry and to industrial democracy throughout the world.

On Women Correspondents and Other New Ideas

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

[As Berlin correspondent and head of the European service of the Philadelphia Public Ledger and associated newspapers, Dorothy Thompson is distinguished as the only American woman in such a position. The Nation asked her to describe the activities of a woman in the field of European journalism and the difficulties, if any, that she has encountered in the course of her rapid advancement to a post of great importance and influence.]

Berlin, December 1

THERE seems to me to be nothing extraordinary or of significance in the fact that a woman should be a foreign newspaper correspondent; indeed, I am surprised that The Nation should invite an article on such a subject and thus lend itself to the specious feminism of the women's magazines, which persists in finding cause for jubilation every time a woman becomes, for the first time, an iceman, a road surveyor, or a senator. Actually, this playing up of women is a disservice and an anachronism, in a day when no one any longer questions their general intelligence. The only question still raised, even by the most misogynist males, is whether women can be geniuses. Since little is known about genius, male or female, this matter may be debated for some time to come. Suffice it to say that genius is not required of a newspaper correspondent; on the contrary, a demon would be a burden and a liability. In everything short of genius it is high time women were taken for granted; or more importantly, that they take themselves for granted. The see-what-the-little-darling-has-done-now attitude ought to be outlawed.

Actually, in the field of journalism, the peculiarly American habit of regarding women as "news," of playing up the way they cut their hair and choose their waistlines, mates, and careers, as matters of major human interest, and of regarding their inevitable development as something quite apart from the general evolution of civilization, has opened a certain clearly defined field which, while it offers opportunities to a great number of women, threatens to suck in the talents of all women who seek a career in newspaper writing. Since women are news let women write it, is an accepted attitude of mind in most editorial offices. Society (which in America is considered almost exclusively woman's sphere), women's clubs, women's careers, women's politics—these are the assignments which most naturally fall to the girl "cub." She begins in this field, and she probably ends here, because it has become an important part of every newspaper, and is constantly looking for new writers.

Parenthetically, may I say, it is my conviction that this "women's stuff" would be vastly more amusing were it written by men. The editor of an American newspaper with a Paris edition once told me that, losing a woman fashion reporter, he put a bright boy on the job and that the boy was the best fashion editor he had ever had. The reporter confided to me he had never enjoyed assignments more. The moral of this is not the hasty one of the anti-feminists that any man can do any woman's job better than she can herself, but that despite the American effort to separate the interests of men and women, women are still interested in men and men in women.

Women, conscious of themselves as "the sex," are a bore. Large bodies of women aggressively being women, without the alleviating comic spirit, which, as Meredith pointed out, men introduce into the society of women and women into the society of men, are infinitely wearisome when not somberly terrifying. A career of reporting such assemblages was unpleasant to contemplate, and therefore I chose to begin my newspaper work on the continent of Europe where women are accepted as indigenous, and where such things as exclusive women's activities do not exist.

I have been asked whether I did not encounter in Europe difficulties as a woman journalist concerned with so-called serious affairs. So far as I have observed no single one of the many difficulties which have beset my path as an inexperienced adventurer in a new profession in strange lands arose from the fact of my sex. I encountered the difficulty of my own ignorance, of the fact that I had failed to absorb from my university training a vivid and accurate historical sense, a clear idea of economics, or fluency in any foreign language. I had been brought up on the easy-going theory that knowledge was "knowing where you can find a thing," and I had to learn that there is only one place where one can quickly get information in an emergency and that is out of one's self. I had to begin to discipline my memory, and rid myself as far as possible of a sentimental way of looking at things. But surely, these difficulties beset anyone who attempts the same work, with the same background, and my university was coeducational.

It is a common misunderstanding of us Americans, arising from the fact that we have an exaggerated interest in all the activities of women, regardless of their intrinsic worth, that Europeans do not take the work of women seriously. On the contrary, a European would find it curious and amusing that a newspaper woman should take a trip to Europe, at great expense, in order to ascertain what the Queen of the Belgians thinks about love and clothes. But he is not particularly surprised to find a woman interested in the Dawes Plan, or the question of national minorities. Educated European women have of late years taken an increasing interest in politics and been competent to discuss them. European men are accustomed to talk about art, literature, and affairs of state with women. Had it not been so, the salon could never have existed nor played the role which it has. Even in Germany, of the Kirche-Kinder-Küche reputation, one of the first "men of letters" and ablest historians is a woman, Ricarda Huch, and the artistic world has, in such people as Käthe Kollwitz, Milly Steger, and the late Paula Modersohn, women whom their colleagues do not hesitate to treat as equals.

In the field of journalism Europe has many distinguished women. Although I do not know of any European newspaper which employs a woman as political correspondent, women in Europe have successfully invaded a sphere of newspaper work still exclusively in the hands of men in America. They are excellent feuilletonists: the European equivalent of the American columnist. The material they handle, wittily and worldlily, is not "woman's stuff" but politics, literature, art, and the whole amusing spectacle which mankind stages day by day. Offhand, I think of Berta Sucherkandl, who in Vienna is one of the most important interpreters of French life, and who, though her chief interest lies in literature and the stage, often writes ably of politics; of the inimitable "Colette" in Paris; of Margit Vészi, daughter of the editor of the Budapest Pester Lloyd, who writes brilliantly of all manner of things in the languages and newspapers of three countries. It is quite true that the number of women in European journalism is smaller than in America, and the competition with men is much keener. That is because of general economic conditions and because no special field is relegated to women as their own. But the quality of their work is perhaps the better for this.

My own newspaper has never made me self-conscious at being a woman. My earliest connections with the Public Ledger were entirely impersonal. I first contributed as a free lancer, whose age, training, and experience were unknown to the Philadelphia editors. A deal of journalistic education I can thank to my colleagues whom I met on the ground of common enthusiasms, interests, and difficulties. But I have evidence that there is still prejudice in some quarters against women as staff correspondents. A member of the Associated Press recently said to me, frankly, "Women can never see news. They see either 'good' news or 'bad' news." From which one must infer that a woman was responsible for the motto of the New York Times!

In the Driftway

A RECENT letter to the Drifter makes pertinent comment on his thoughts concerning interest on investments:

The Drifter in the issue of December 18 puts up a good argument to demonstrate the folly of the benighted individual who left $10 at interest for 1,000 years. But he need not have gone back to tenth-century England to find an illustration, when there was one right before his nose on Manhattan Island. About 300 years ago one Peter Minuit, a newly arrived immigrant who had got by Ellis Island without being held up, having twenty-four dollars' worth of valuables about him looked about for a profitable investment. Fortunately there were no savings banks or other financial institutions to show him the advantage of thrift, so the only opportunity he could find was an investment in land. He put the whole sum into the purchase of Manhattan. Had he been advised by a modern thrift advocate and acted accordingly, putting the sum out at compound interest at 6 per cent and never touching either interest or principal for 300 years, his heirs of today would have had but the beggarly sum of $900,000,000, or less than a Rockefeller can accumulate in fifty years. But having invested as he did, his heirs and assigns (especially his assigns) of today own an estate worth considerably more than three billions. Not only that, but, unlike the disciple of the thrift advocate, they have during all these years enjoyed the rental of the island, have spent or saved as they saw fit, and still have their fortune intact.

TO which the Drifter makes ready answer that such a proceeding may be all right for Peter Minuit, but if he—the Drifter—were to purchase an island for $24, in three hundred years, or long before that, the miserable bit of land would have sunk into the sea or have become volcanic or otherwise visited with misfortune and pestilence.

And he still maintains that no one can prophesy what may be happening on Manhattan Island 700 years from now, or ten centuries after the original purchase. Prosperous as the place is at present, it is apparent to anybody but a real-estate dealer or a lunatic that the population cannot keep on increasing, that the buildings cannot continue to rise, that subways will never be adequate for the inmates, that the time will come when not a foot of the land will be available to walk on. And when that hour comes, as come it must unless the crash comes first, catastrophe will result—catastrophe, that is, for property owners; but deliverance for the city's population, who, discovering no place to step in New York, will take themselves elsewhere. Then the island may conceivably sink back into the state in which Peter Minuit found it and $24 be considerably more than it is worth.

Parasites and College Endowments

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Miss Zona Gale of the board of regents of the University of Wisconsin gave some good reasons in The Nation [September 30] why our universities and colleges should not be supported, even in small degree, from the fruits of monopoly. Miss Gale argues that the acceptance of monopoly money subjects the beneficiary to potential control by friends of monopoly. But it is not necessary to speak cautiously of "potential control"; instances may be cited of actual control.

Take, for instance, the Carnegie endowment for university professors. It was stipulated that no college or university professor could have the Carnegie money if the institution with which he was connected was under the control of any religious denomination. At once it was found that a large number of colleges and universities were willing to renounce their religious affiliations for the sake of becoming beneficiaries of the Carnegie endowment.

Now, it may be that it is better for the cause of higher education for colleges and universities to be entirely free from religious denominational influences and control. But many good people do not think so. And when we find that so many educational institutions were willing to renounce, and to a certain degree to repudiate, highly cherished religious traditions and affiliations, who can deny that educational endowments do exercise positive and extensive control? Recently a Southern college with a sacred name, signifying divinity itself, renounced that name, around which clustered many precious religious associations, and for a monetary consideration adopted the name of a multi-millionaire cigarette manufacturer who was a past master in the technique of monopoly.

But there are other and potent reasons for not accepting endowment funds from the fortunes of multi-millionaires and monopolists which are not mentioned by Miss Gale. The acceptance of these funds tends to perpetuate the evil of swollen fortunes and the corresponding evil of shrunken fortunes. Statues and memorial tablets are erected to those who give money to our colleges and universities. Portraits in oil by highly paid artists are hung in halls of fame. There is constantly accumulating a great fund of laudatory literature, praising the life and the achievements of men of great wealth who give their money either before or after their death to our educational institutions.

We are not likely to make much progress in ridding ourselves of social parasites when we are honoring them as benefactors of the people. You cannot convict a thief of stealing a pig if one of the jurymen has had one of the hams.

The Higher Critics

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Three bankers, so we are told in large advertisements, recommend Mr. Bok's "Twice Thirty." The president of a Washington financial institution assures us that it is "one of the great books of the century." The two others are scarcely less enthusiastic. Thus at last a quietus is found for the ancient quarrel between the critic and the author. Why let literary hacks and college professors goad creative artists like Mr. Bok into frenzy? Turn the job of reviewing over to those who represent the solid and safe sentiment of the community. Before you make up your New Year's list of books, consult your local banker.

SILAS BENT

"Hamlet" in Modern Dress

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I speak briefly of "Hamlet" in modern dress? It seems to me that the production has undoubtedly been a revelation. Those of us who went to the performance with even a fair amount of open-mindedness, albeit likewise with a skeptical irritatedness against the principle of presenting "Hamlet" in modern dress, undoubtedly felt, some sooner, some later, that Shakespeare was getting across to us more directly than in other presentations of "Hamlet." There was nothing between us and Shakespeare's thoughts and emotions. Possibly Hamlet was interpreted a little rationalistically, as the consciously planning, revengeful, active Hamlet of the Werder school of interpreters, rather than as the more traditional dreamer-Hamlet; yet even if one's own conviction favors the latter conception, one had to confess that one's realization of the play was deepened.

Nevertheless there seems to be some outcry against this way of presenting Hamlet. It was just so several years ago when the Macbeth of Lionel Barrymore and Robert Edmond Jones startled the conventional theatergoer and the academic interpreter of Shakespeare.

But why should we not be grateful for every sincere interpretation? To me it seems that there is room for all types of presentation: the romantic Shakespeare, the realistic Shakespeare, and the expressionistic Shakespeare are all true. For every great genius is a cosmos; each age finds itself in him in a different way. Therefore we ought to welcome all the possibilities of interpretation in order to enrich ever more our realization of a great genius. We can enjoy Hampden and Barrymore and others, and yet welcome the new Hamlet of Basil Sydney and his coworkers. We should welcome this new proof that Shakespeare is indeed not of his age merely but for all time.

How Bad Is the South?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Eastern wits have long taken a mischievous delight in getting under the thin, sensitive skin of the South with bare bodkins or other instruments of torture; and the Babbitts who dominate the South, and therefore presume to speak for her, always react to the prick of the bodkin in a certain, easily predictable way. So when a Yankee wit is threatened with ennui all he need do to relieve the tedium of existence, and incidentally to add to the gaiety of the nation, is touch some Southern sore spot. And obviously that is not hard to do. The South seems to have many raw spots. As instances, let Mr. H. L. Mencken tauntingly refer to the "late Southern Confederacy" or editorially remark that he never heard of a "printable manuscript coming out of Mississippi," the Rotary, Kiwanis, and Ku Klux Klubs, not to mention any of the other "cultural," "protective," or "patriotic" organizations with which this region abounds, instantly mobilize, buckle on the whole armor of outraged righteousness, invoke the aid of Jehovah and Stonewall Jackson, and vindicate the honor of the South once more. Let The Nation publish an article holding the mirror up to Arkansas, or let the coldly statistical Census Bureau issue figures on illiteracy, and every "true" Southerner feels that Dixieland is maliciously libeled.

Why these resentments? Why this bristling, belligerent attitude by those who undertake to speak for the South? Why this petulant sensitiveness? Why this running amuck in impotent rage? Why confirm the critic's charges in this undignified fashion?

The nobler and the manlier course to follow in such circumstances would be to acknowledge our foolish faults and seriously undertake to overcome them. It appears that only a timid, insignificant minority of us Southerners are aware that there is any cause for shame in the quality of Southern culture.

But I sometimes do deplore that the South's most valuable critics too often, in their sweeping, withering criticisms of our crudeness and bigotry, fail to note any exceptions. There are a few of us, forty-five, at least, in Arkansas, who are earnestly striving, against overwhelming odds, to make the South hospitable to modern ideas and to do something to lessen those distressing faults of which we are so often and so keenly reminded. It is bad enough to endure this loneliness without being annihilated by witty but indiscriminating generalizations.

First Glance

INTEREST inevitably attaches to the autobiographical portions of "Sonnets, with Folk Songs from the Spanish," by Havelock Ellis (Houghton Mifflin: $3). The ideas which Mr. Ellis has developed in his prose have been so rich and important, presenting as they have so gallant a defense of all that is meant by human passion, that much might be expected from his poems—even though they be, as some of these are, his earliest work. Indeed their very earliness might argue, granted the existence in Mr. Ellis either then or now of some ability in poetry, the value of these pieces as straws showing from what direction and with what velocity the wind of his maturing doctrine blew upon him when he was coming of age. And it is in this light that Mr. Ellis views them. "Taken altogether," he says in his preface, "this whole group of sonnets lays bare the roots of the impulses that have stirred throughout all the activities of his life, from 'The New Spirit' in which in 1889, nearly five years after the sonnets ceased, he first put forth his program, to 'The Dance of Life,' with which, in 1923, he sought to round it off." The translations of Spanish folk songs, which are not happy, need not concern us here.

What shall be said of the sonnets, then, by one who finds them on the whole disappointing? Not, certainly, that they are crude—which is what Mr. Ellis calls them. Mr. Ellis asks the critic of poetry to remember that he himself "views them as an archaeological record, interesting apart from any technical quality or the absence of it, the record of personal experiences in the evolution of an individual person's spirit." But a critic of poetry will not have been thinking of "technical quality" at all. He will have wanted the record, too; and it is the record which I for one do not find here in anything like the fulness or the intensity that I had anticipated. If technique meant smoothness, which of course it does not, then the sonnets would be without a fault. What the sonnets do not contain is poetry; which is another manner of saying that they do not express what they have to express in any of the subtle and perhaps mysterious ways which poetry has taken to herself. What they have to express Mr. Ellis has since expressed much more poetically in his prose—which is his way. His way was never that of poetry, I suspect; and I imagine I am confirmed by the explanation he gives of the fact that he abandoned verse at twenty-five: "The author became too absorbed in the immediate practical and emotional interests of a many-sided activity in life to find time to bend over the images of life in the camera obscura of memory." Had he been a poet then, nothing save poetry could have absorbed him; were he a poet now, he surely would produce a better definition of the poet's function. A poem which does not say what it has to say poetically says nothing. The truth of a work of art lies in its beauty. So that I find Mr. Ellis's sonnets telling very little truth either about Mr. Ellis or about the world.

Wild Geese. By Martha Ostenso. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.
God Head. By Leonard Cline. The Viking Press. $2.

WHEN an author has made up his stern mind that he is going to be "true" to farm life he pulls a farmer out of bed in the chill dawn and washes his face in cold water at the sink and sets him down to a breakfast of black coffee and fried potatoes. He sends him out into the field, where he plows and sweats and makes his son plow and sweat and stay away from dances and young, pretty girls. Whenever the farmer talks he uses words thick like dead fish on a plate; and whenever the author describes any action he uses language no less thick and dull. The characters and the events toil and sweat through three hundred pages like an ordered rotation of crops and spinach hugely accumulated into great piles; and by this process a work of art is supposed to be brought painfully into life. After a time the book is compared to Hamsun's "Growth of the Soil" under the conviction that Hamsun's book likewise gives a picture of farm life as romantic as a lobworm and as eloquent as a heap of radishes.

There can be no denying the honesty of Mr. Muilenburg's "Prairie"; and if one had never read Hardy and Hamsun and Lawrence and Powys one might fancy honesty to be the mark of high art. Mr. Muilenburg is certainly honest in excluding all meretricious excitements from the developing dullness of his narrative. He is obviously not writing for the moving pictures. He keeps away from scenes of seduction and adultery and peasant melodrama; and no doubt life moves externally as he makes life move in the story of a young farmer who rebels against his father, marries a pretty silly girl, goes further west to build his own farm, and by a hard courage conquers the earth and the weakness of his wife and sons. There is neither comic relief nor relief of any kind. The days pass, while use and custom unwind into a dragging routine, and the earth renews her seasons.

After all, Hamsun does more than give a peasant's progress and call it life. Both in "Growth of the Soil" and in "Pan" his farms and woodlands take on a luminous richness that does not depend on melodrama or fraudulent romance. Life is more than a recitation of the day's work; and art is not dishonest because Falstaff talks gloriously as no old drunken loafer ever talked and Medea's eloquence outmeasures the speech employed by barbarian princesses. Hamsun's peasants are no more than Hamsun disguised as a peasant with a mind tuned to the quiver of a leaf and the sound of grain falling like a golden music. No doubt farmers talk and act like the farmers in "Prairie"; but an artist hardly contents himself with the outward shows of life and character. He has got to draw life from the rich black mud of the soil and the farmer's soul; and that black mud must somehow take on its own rich being and substance.

Of course Mr. Muilenburg does not go in for the sort of thing practiced by Miss Ostenso in "Wild Geese." It is the very sort of thing which has turned romance into a term of contempt and made suspect anyone who is not "honest" about the general dullness of farm life. Herein you will find a rascal farmer degrading his wife and children, and a strong young daughter of the soil who wrestles and kisses with a young husky, and a nice young teacher stranded among the oafs, and a prairie fire, and a farmer slugging his wife in the fifth reel, and young bodies that kiss and don't part: in fact, you will find just what you always find in the moving pictures complicated by wild geese flying . . . flying . . . flying . . . at dramatic moments and lending the required air of mystic yearning to the impressionable heroine who interprets the honking as something I-know-not-what . . . "a magnificent seeking through solitude . . . an endless quest." It is not another "White Peacock" by a new D. H. Lawrence. It has none of the splendor of a white peacock or the skyeey romance of a wild goose. It is merely a well-stuffed goose.

A worm's-eye view of farm life and a wild goose's-eye view of farm life are no doubt well enough in their way, but they seem to catch so little of the inner drama or the rich soil of field and woodland girdling a little outland farm. One turns from the mumbling of peasants and the honking of wild geese to the golden thunder of Mr. Cline's orchestration in "God Head." From the very first scene in which Paulus Kempf flies from the mob storming the lecture hall to the last scene where he pushes the betrayed Finnish husband from a high ledge hung over a gulf Mr. Cline unfolds the magnificence of a saga. It is more than just the tale of a sculptor and labor leader who finds refuge with the slow simple Finns of the Northwest and seduces the blue-eyed wife of the huge peasant who has saved him from death and madness in the wilderness. More than anything else it is Mr. Cline's prose holding light like a steel net which transmutes a wild melodrama into an ordered and thrilling rhythm of word and scene and folk-lore.

DONALD DOUGLAS

Legend or History?

Sagnet om Jesus. Georg Brandes. Copenhagen: Gyldendal.

. . . I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice. . . I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch—AND I WILL BE HEARD.

THESE challenging lines of William Lloyd Garrison preface Georg Brandes's new book, "The Jesus Legend," in which he affirms that Jesus is a myth. Brandes at eighty-three has evidently decided to refute the tradition that age sweetens even the most obstinate of pagans. He has never been a "Christian" any more than he has ever been a "Jew." It is now many years since he wrote in volume two of "Main Currents":

If a thinker . . . speaks freely of the customs prescribed by the church he is usually designated as a mocker of religion in general or even as an atheist. The orthodox person believes that "religion" consists of, or at least can only exist together with, certain definite church customs with which it has always been associated in his consciousness. He does not suspect that the attacker has a much higher and purer conception of the religious idea than himself . . . and as he is not sufficiently developed to differentiate between the various categories of attackers, he classes the inspired thinker and champion of a higher order with the ordinary crowd of graceless beings. He confuses the one above him with those beneath him.

It is well to keep this paragraph in mind when judging the book in which Brandes removes the pedestal from a figure which, despite all doubt of the Bible, despite all disbelief in the "miracles," seems yet to be the dearest possession of a large portion of humanity.

It is a little book, but 103 pages. Brandes takes William Tell as his text. For more than six hundred years the story of William Tell was believed to be true. Tell became so identified with Switzerland that for years the Swiss stamps bore his picture. It is now admitted that he is but a legend. He has never lived. "But that takes nothing from his greatness; he is, and remains, an effective ideal, and as a pattern still governs the mind of man."

The miracles are first disposed of. We no longer ask, says Brandes, whether Jesus was born by a miracle, whether he cured by miracles or expelled devils by miracles—we no longer know what devils are, and no longer know what is meant by Virgin Birth and the like. They are specters which we never have seen and to which we never give a thought.

The Jews did not crucify Jesus, could not have crucified anybody; the last words of Jesus are traced back to the twenty-second Psalm ("How strange that Jesus should have died with a quotation on his lips!"); the details of the Passion were drawn from the Old Testament to make an old prophecy come true; the teaching of Jesus may be found there and elsewhere; Nero did not set fire to Rome and did not burn Christians for candles; the Gospels are saturated with older religions; and, finally, even the Sermon on the Mount is declared to have come from Didache, the purely Jewish pre-Christian document (later falsified by the church, says Brandes) which was discovered in Constantinople in 1873. "It is now generally acknowledged," adds Brandes, "that even the Lord's Prayer is not of the New Testament but is a compilation from Old Testament patterns."

It is not always easy to follow Brandes in his reasoning, but if we keep the quotation from "Main Currents" in mind there is perhaps a key in his conclusion: "It detracts nothing from divine beings that they have had their true life, their only life, in the mind of man."

FRITHJOF TOKSVIG

From Professor to Patriot

Die Weltrevolution: Erinnerungen und Betrachtungen. Von T. G. Masaryk. Berlin: Erich Reiss Verlag.

THE President of the Czecho-Slovak Republic likes to dwell in this volume of his memoirs upon the part which fortunate accidents played in his life, turning a poor Slovak child into a great Czech university professor and politician and finally into the founder of a state, the destroyer of the ancient Hapsburg monarchy, and the most important author of the new map of Central and Southeastern Europe. His experiences lead Masaryk to a teleological philosophy of human life. And indeed they were amazing accidents which developed this man for his destiny and saved him from the most various perils.

Politically the most important accident in Masaryk's life was the unforeseen duration of the war. "Had the Allies won quickly," he writes, "we [the Czechs] would not have won our independence and Austria would, in one form or another, have survived." The Entente statesmen were generally Austrophile; they hoped to reestablish Austria as a sort of counterweight against Germany's overgrown power—but the Austrian statesmen were incapable of utilizing the opportunity. Masaryk's greatest achievement was to convince the Entente statesmen that Austria, if it survived, would still be a vassal of Germany, and that, in order to weaken Germany, Austria must be broken up. The incredible mistakes and duplicity of Emperor Charles and his ministers of course helped Masaryk. But it took four years of war to change the Entente point of view, and Wilson and Lansing came around only at the last moment. Only on September 3, 1918, did Lansing recognize the Czecho-Slovaks as independent belligerents and Masaryk and Benes as their de facto Government; and it was on the basis of that recognition, generalizing it to declare all the nationalities of Austria-Hungary independent, that Wilson on October 18, 1918, refused Austria's peace offer, thus striking Austria-Hungary from the list of living states. Ten days later the Czechs at home had only to take power into their hands. There was no opposition.

So Masaryk's anti-Austrian venture ended. He calls it a "revolution." There was never such another revolution. "The people rises, the storm breaks loose," says the German poet. But the Czech people, even though, as Masaryk says, it had in its heart broken away from Austria, sat calmly in its place—except for the isolated mutinies and conspiracies which Masaryk found so useful in his propaganda abroad. Masaryk's activities were secretly supported by his friends at home, but the Czech politicians officially disavowed him from time to time; his request that a few Czech leaders be sent abroad to support him and Benes remained unfulfilled. Hapsburg domination was overthrown from abroad, the Czechs merely ratified the overthrow. Masaryk and Wilson are counted by the Czechs as the founders of their national independence—Wilson, the foreigner, and Masaryk, the emigrant. Here is a new long-distance technical marvel, greater than the telegraph, the telephone, and the radio; here telepolitics achieved a telerevolution. Masaryk even got his funds for the most part from Czech emigrants in America. It was, however, a cheap revolution; it cost less than a million dollars.

In Fundamental Terms

Dr. Transit. By I. S. Boni and Liveright. $2.

INTO a literature which views familiar experience under the aspects of time and place comes a sinewy, sensual book nourished, for a marvel, upon fantasy and intellection. Unlike most current fiction of importance, this work has no use for the friendly commonplaces of realistic representation. The characters whose actions and thoughts compose the ideational pattern of "Dr. Transit" perform what an American philosopher called, in another connection, a "ballet of bloodless abstractions." What I. S. has here given to a world which should be grateful for it is a novel of ideas—not like the blandly entertaining romans philosophiques of Voltaire but rather like the work of Dostoevski in his metaphysical moments. But where in the Russian novels there is no deviation from the plausible, in this American book an unapologetic imagination mauls reality like an infant Hercules. And while the author of "The Possessed" presents ideas which are emotional storm-centers and whirls of bolts and lightnings that set the whole man on fire, the author of "Dr. Transit" takes his intellectual excursions with a coolness that gives the reader goose-flesh. "A spirit coldly dissenting with humanity," he says of the phantasmagorical homunculus who gives the book its title, "was harbored in his harsh head." That inhuman spirit blows chilly through the book.

The volume holds such good things that one should willingly suffer the discomfort of this draught. Its great virtue is that it treats of essential matters in fundamental terms. Sex, man's will to surpass himself, God, death—these are the themes of the novel, and the way in which the author manages them, bare-handed, is a spectacle generally to exhilarate, if sometimes to puzzle, the mind of the reader. The substance of the book is in essence that of poetry, and indeed the writing not seldom reaches the high level upon which poetry must be sustained.

Each day ended, atop some hill crest, secure like a turret, with a marsh like a moat underneath; evening hissed among the trees; the sun fell away like the last spin of a coin. They watched the piling of the shadows of the West, fir-dark, like gloaming forests or maw-dark like looming cities, the silhouetted trees, nude, bathing in twilight, the casual break of stars, like swimming heads; they awaited the slow climb of the moon, near and speculative, its calm light, its Abelom adventure among the branches, its sense of companionship, of a great and unsolemn warden, too distant for intrusion but near enough for safe-guarding.

And if one could rip them from their context, there are other passages of more striking individuality. The originality of the style is augury of the appearance, with this book, of a new and authentic writer.

Drama

The Powers of Darkness

LAST year the company at the Neighborhood Playhouse recreated upon its stage one of the most serene of masterpieces; this year it has chosen to show the other side of the picture and to produce a play whose beauty is of a dark and fearsome kind, for Ansky's "The Dybbuk" manages by means of the skilful use of atmosphere and ritual to externalize the passionate and tortured mysticism of the medieval Jew much as the airy charm of "The Little Clay Cart" externalized the untroubled serenity and the daylight wisdom of a people confidently at home in a kindly world. Written by a man who had escaped intellectually from the religion of his fathers but who discovered late in life how profoundly that religion still engaged his emotions, the play uses an ancient legend as the means whereby the spiritual life of a people may be invoked; and it clothes this legend with an outward garment of ritual, tremendously effective upon the stage for the very reason that it was unconsciously evolved for a dramatic purpose—for the purpose, that is to say, of being an outward and visible symbol of a spiritual attitude. By means of their wailing chants, their solemn ceremonies, and those songs of wild exultation into which their suppressed passions now and again broke out, the Chassidic Jews revealed to one another the tumult of their souls; removed to the stage, these same means hypnotize the spectator into a poetic faith in the legend itself and make real for him the mood which generated it.

Ancient India, at peace with the world and, more important still, at peace with itself, generates gay fancies to make yet brighter its golden days, but to the Russian Jew, oppressed from without by an alien people and torn within by a religion which sets his exuberantly sensuous nature at war with a sternly puritan code, the universe is no such graceful affair. Even his God, whose goodness is of a stern and terrible kind, permits no joys which are not fierce and bitter, and God is but barely a match for the forces of evil which are as completely omnipresent as He. The Kabala, whose magic formulae may open the gates of heaven, is as likely to send the eager student plunging to hell, and in the very midst of a holy wedding some dybbuk, some uneasy spirit, may seize upon the body of the bride; and not God Himself, invoked with all the ceremony which He has prescribed, can send the demon forth. Life for such a one is as intense as life can be, for there is no moment when he is not filled with a sense of being at the focus of forces much greater than he; there is for him no act which is not a ritual, which does not, that is to say, involve a rapport of some sort with the unseen world; and his taut nerves are perpetually upon the verge of an ecstasy which it needs only the hypnotic effect of some traditional ceremony to precipitate. He is, in the language of psychology, perpetually upon the verge of hysteria; but in the language of religion—and perhaps of art—he is intoxicated with God.

Ansky's play passes no criticism upon this spiritual life, for its purpose is to record and reproduce with the detachment of one whose intellectual dissent is completely overborne by a tender emotional comprehension. And yet the beauty with which it invests the story is a kind of apology. These people, it seems to say, grotesque and unlovely though in some of their aspects they may be, have about them a spiritual greatness. Oppressed and self-tortured, their souls have been twisted with misery; but misery has not made them little, and though the world which their imagination has created is dark and terrible it has its grandeur. Their passion has no channel of expression which is not half choked and their ever-present sense of sin robs them of all grace, but passion has never ceased to burn and no humiliation has robbed them of the sense of playing a great part in the spiritual drama of the universe.

Some who saw the original production of "The Dybbuk" in the tiny Habima Theater in Russia tell me that the performance at the Neighborhood is vastly inferior, and perhaps it is, but I, having no standard of comparison, find it very lovely indeed and another proof of my contention that nowhere else in America are plays requiring a non-realistic atmosphere and style done half so well as there. Mary Ellis as the heroine gives an excellent performance, and it is hard to imagine how some of the views, such as in particular that in which the half minatory beggars demand to dance with the frightened bride, could be more effectively realized.

Offenbach's comic opera "La Périhole" (Jolson Theater), presented as the second bill of the Moscow Art Theater Musical Studio, is far from offering the company an opportunity comparable to that offered by "Lysistrata," and though it is made amusing and frequently brilliant there is no denying that even these marvelous Russians cannot disguise the fact that Messrs. Meilhac and Halévy are not Aristophanes or that Offenbach's music is as often tawdry as it is gay. At the Forty-fourth Street Theater Houdini is giving an extremely interesting exhibition of his various talents. The production of "The Man Who Never Died" at the Provincetown Theater can be explained only by the fact that it is marked by the adolescent mysticism to which the Provincetown group seems to be committing itself.

The Case of South Tyrol

By W. F. SCHUBERT

ONE of the most flagrant violations of President Wilson's Fourteen Points was the ceding of the German part of South Tyrol to Italy. There would have been no difficulty in establishing an ethnically clearly drawn frontier since the Salurner Klause has for 1,400 years been the southern border of German South Tyrol, which has a compact German-speaking population of 230,000. The titulus for the annexation of this province was a gentlemen's agreement, the secret Treaty of London in 1915, between Lord Grey, Asquith, etc., and the Italian war cabinet, in which South Tyrol served as a bribe for Italy's breaking the Triple Alliance with Germany and Austria. Wilson's memoirs give a feeble consolation when they state: "Unfortunately the President promised the Brenner to Orlando whereby 150,000 (really 230,000) Tyrolese were handed over to Italy; this he recognized later as a gross mistake and deeply regretted."

Since November, 1918, South Tyrol has undergone three different kinds of treatment. The first lasted from the military occupation till the ratification of the peace treaty; the second from that time till the end of 1922 when the Fascist party came into power; the third started in the early days of 1923 when Fascism began to mean organized terror for all non-Fascisti. In the first period South Tyrol was fairly well governed, the Italians not being certain whether their imperialistic cravings would be satisfied. At that time many promising speeches were made by the king and various cabinet ministers. South Tyrol, which could expect nothing from the impoverished and then rapidly collapsing Austria, believed resignedly in the Italian expressions of good-will. After this period the "assimilation" inaugurated by a well-organized Italian immigration began but, on the whole, no really illegal measures were as yet taken. With the consolidation of the Fascist Government, however, conditions suddenly changed and the third phase, that of ruthless oppression, set in. There can be no doubt that today no other minority exists in Europe experiencing a like treatment.

Press reports can but vaguely illustrate the martyrdom of these quarter million of Tyrolese who have backing them no protecting mother country, as Lorraine had in its time, and no League of Nations, as other minorities have (Italy not having had to sign a minority treaty). Italian papers explain the ill-treatment in the following way: Austria will before long join Germany, there will be then seventy million Germans on Italy's northern border, and thus Italy is forced either to Italianize the Tyrolese or to crowd them out of their homeland, for the Italians want Germany to find an Italian province south of the Brenner.

With this purpose the new Italian policy is directed, first, against the Tyrolese school and language. A royal decree has abolished the century-old Tyrolese school system, declaring the Italian language the only one to be used in all the 400 schools in South Tyrol. German even as a second language is forbidden. By this decree the Austrian eight-year compulsory school system established about 1850, by virtue of which illiteracy was practically unknown in pre-war Tyrol, was abolished in favor of the Italian four-year voluntary system, owing to which Italy possesses almost 40 per cent of illiterates. Since the introduction of this system illiteracy has been growing fast in South Tyrol. Numerous petitions and protests against the decree, one to the Secretariat of the League of Nations with 50,000 signatures, have met with failure. The present situation is appalling. The small children, who even in the kindergartens are forbidden to use the language of their homes, do not understand their new Italian teachers, the native ones having been discharged wholesale, and are growing up in complete ignorance. Many parents no longer send their children to school, although the engagement of private governesses to teach the children German is forbidden. A teacher recently described the situation as follows: "I taught secretly sixty-four children in different families. With the children of the third school year I had to begin with simple lessons in writing, as not one of them could read or write. In the highest class, which will leave school this year, not one pupil knew the German and Italian letters; not one had any idea of grammar."

In the law courts, too, and in the administration of the government Italian is the only language permitted. Thus the Tyrolese find themselves excluded from jury, bar, and civil service. The few Tyrolese officials who were not discharged and who rapidly acquired Italian are being transferred to Italy. Italian commissioners and priests are replacing the beloved Tyrolese burgomasters and clergy. Thus the 70-year-old burgomaster of Bozen, after twenty-seven years in office, was expelled in favor of a 27-year-old Fascist who could not speak a word of the German language.

At this writing all the Tyrolese dailies have been forced to stop publication with the exception of one small paper in Meran, which expects suppression any day. Thus the 230,000 Tyrolese have no longer any press of their own. Almost all organizations, even non-political ones (Alpine clubs, fire brigades, etc.), have been dissolved. Lectures on Tyrolese art and literature are forbidden; a large number of special schools are closed. Austrian academic degrees are not validated and students who want to study in Austria are refused passports.

The use of the German name of any place on any publication (even privately printed matter) is forbidden. New Italian names were coined to replace the thousand-year-old Tyrolese ones. Descriptions on picture post cards, maps, etc., must not be accompanied by a German translation. Recently a 74-year-old woman was arrested because she had not changed the Tyrolese legend on one of her saint's pictures into Italian. Pictures of Andreas Hofer are confiscated. Gravestones must bear Italian inscriptions. The police force is Italian. Military service is introduced in spite of former pledges to exempt Tyrolese who fought in the war. To the consternation of their parents young conscripts are being sent to the filthy barracks of southern Italy, where no one understands their mother tongue, and Italian regiments are quartered in the old towns and villages of South Tyrol. On the night following the supposed attempt on Mussolini's life some hundred citizens of Bozen were arrested without warrant, and through a well-organized secret service and a special censorship for the post many Tyrolese are today in prison. Most of these high-handed measures were ordered by the royal prefect of Trent, a notorious Tyrolophobe, who is, unconstitutionally, given more power than the other Italian prefects.

The few examples given will suffice to illustrate the efforts of the Italian Government to smother the cultural liberty and national sentiment of the Tyrolese minority. It is well to remember that a change of government, unlikely as it is, will not radically alter the situation, since before its suppression Italy's most liberal paper, the Corriere della Sera, supported the policy now adopted in South Tyrol, and the business of racial assimilation is favored by the Italian Liberal Party.

The Italians view the situation thus: the Brenner Pass is the strategic and "therefore sacred" frontier of Italy. In the interest of security the annexed country has to be assimilated as soon and as thoroughly as possible. Moreover, South Tyrol was Roman and is therefore Italian soil and only after the collapse of the Roman Empire did Teutonic tribes invade it. It must be re-Italianized. Austria has had Italians under her domination and the annexation and assimilation of an Austrian province is but a just retaliation. The first argument carries little weight, considering that 40,000,000 Italians are facing only 6,000,000 disarmed Austrians, and besides, Italian military authorities have repeatedly affirmed that the Brenner Pass cannot be regarded as an advantageous strategic frontier. The second argument cannot be taken seriously outside of Italy, although President Wilson is reported to have believed in it. The population of South Tyrol has been German since the sixth century when the Bajuvarii settled there. As regards the third argument it may be remembered that the Italian minority in the Trentino not only had its Italian schools maintained by Austria but that Italian was the official language used in the administration of the local government.

There are three possibilities for the future. An enlightened Italian Government will return the annexed country; Rome will change its policy and will try to make the South Tyrolese loyal subjects; or Italy will continue her present methods, eventually forcing the population to emigrate. The recent congress of European minorities held in Geneva has shown how the second solution may be achieved. The League of Nations seems to be the only organization to solve the minority problem, which is truly international and closely related to the rapidly growing race conflict. However, the procedure of the League in minority questions must be changed from being secret and unilateral into being public and bilateral. A minority council should be organized; if in a special case it does not find a satisfactory solution the minority petition should be submitted to the International Court of Justice. All members of the League of Nations (as yet only some small states are bound by formal obligations) should adhere to an international minority convention; furthermore a minority code might be prepared as a special annex to the code of international law now under discussion. Meanwhile reliable, impartial information (by means of conferences, visits, etc.) should be collected and published. The solution of the problem in question is urgent; it will more than anything else contribute to prevent the "next world war." Let me conclude with the words of one of the speakers in the last Assembly of the League of Nations: "What renders the question of minorities painful for the people concerned is that all the world talks about it, but very few persons take the trouble to study it."

The Future of the Telephone

It was fifty years ago that Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone, and yet this anniversary is but a milestone in the progress of telephone development. As the giant oak with its complicated structure grows from the acorn, so a nation-wide system has grown out of Bell's single telephone instrument.

The interconnection of millions of telephones throughout the land, regardless of distance, has not come about easily. It has resulted from a series of scientific discoveries and technical achievements embodied in a telephone plant of vast extent and intricacy. Great economies have already been gained by such technical improvements and more are sure to follow for the benefit of telephone users everywhere.

There are still to come many other discoveries and achievements, not only in transmission of speech, but also in the material and construction details of every part of the network of plant.

The future of the telephone holds forth the promise of a service growing always greater and better, and of a progress—the end of which no one can foresee.

ANOTHER DICTATORSHIP in Europe! Hardly has Primo de Rivera announced a return to parliamentary government in Spain when Premier Pangalos evens the score by proclaiming absolutism in Greece. Perhaps neither change should be taken too seriously. Spain has probably not gained much democracy, nor did Greece have a great deal of it to lose. Still the action of General Pangalos adds a fresh upset in the seething Balkans, where Rumania is agog with Crown Prince Carol's renunciation of the throne and Bulgaria has just witnessed the upset of the Tsankoff ministry and the formation of a new cabinet under Liaptcheff, a Macedonian. So far as the Greeks are concerned, their political life has been a series of over-turns and tragedies since the armistice. It is the misfortune of this gallant and high-spirited people to suffer from a gnawing and exaggerated nationalism and an overproduction of professional politicians. In the last half dozen years Greece has experienced three revolutions, has got rid of two kings, and has fought a disastrous war with Turkey and started one with Bulgaria. Dictator Pangalos is a notorious fire-eater who says his program will rest "solely on armed force." He excuses his assumption of power by saying he has lost patience with the politicians, "who lose no occasion to make trouble for the country." Amen, say we in regard to the trouble made by politicians. But do dictators make less?

JUST AS EVERYTHING seemed well oiled in Washington, and the country appeared to be solid behind President Coolidge in whatever he wanted to do, the farmers of Iowa have thrown a monkey-wrench into the machinery. For all has not been well way down yonder in the corn fields. In the wheat belt prices have been high enough recently to bring back a semblance of prosperity, but corn has been low and the troubles of the farmers have been reflected in the failure of country banks. It required only a fatuous speech like that of Mr. Coolidge in Chicago to precipitate a revolt. And the revolt is not confined to the corn fields either. All over the West and South dissatisfaction has been smoldering under cover of apparent contentment and is now flaring up. At the moment when all seemed most serene Mr. Coolidge has a party crisis on his hands which will require expert manipulation if the Republicans are to be saved from heavy losses in the congressional elections next autumn. Mr. Coolidge is a good politician and will accept any plan just short of something effective in order to placate the agricultural vote. He has committed himself against government price-fixing and, so far as can be discerned, has no alternative of the slightest value. But, as we were saying, he is a good politician and, with the help of other party string-pullers, will probably devise some plan to fool the farmers over another election. For farmers are a credulous folk—about as much so, say, as city dwellers.

WHAT IS THE MATTER with the farmers anyway? The usual way of investigating their troubles is to send out a commission which makes a tour of the agricultural regions, reporting in favor of more cooperatives for the farmers and more telephones and bath-tubs for their wives. What a satire! The right place to investigate the ills of agriculture is in the business and financial districts of our great cities. One answer to the question, What is the matter with the farmers? was supplied at the beginning of the New Year when it was announced that since last June the First National Bank of New York City had been on a dividend basis of 100 per cent a year! When bankers, brokers, transportation companies, commission houses—our whole financial and business fabric—is taking pickings as at present, it should be obvious that there is not going to be much left for the primary producer, the farmer. The irony of our much-vaunted industrial prosperity is that it is kept afloat by an agriculture overloaded with high-interest loans, buffeted by land speculation, keeled over by heavy taxes, and scuttled by low prices for farm products. The only lasting help for the farmers lies in getting the other fellows off their backs. In this no assistance can be expected from Mr. Coolidge and the Republican Party—for the sufficient reason that they are the "other fellows."

THE TARIFF CONFERENCE held under the auspices of the Peoples' Reconstruction League in Washington, December 28 and 29, was remarkably fortunate in that it coincided with the Iowa farmers' outburst, the criticism of the Tariff Commission at the meeting of the American Economic Association, and some hot shot from what remains of the management of the Democratic Party. The combined attack was serious enough to disturb the White House not a little. Particularly rasping was Senator Capper's declaration that more protection must be given to the farmer or less protection to the manufacturer, since it went directly contrary to the learned dicta of Mr. Coolidge's Chicago speech—the most ill-fated utterance he has made since entering the White House. But there were other effective speeches besides Mr. Capper's, notably several upon the woolen and cotton industries which revealed the exploitation of the worker which is taking place throughout New England. There were, of course, some politicians present to insist that tariffs could be honestly drawn and honestly administered for a necessary protection. Even Mr. Coolidge has now admitted that it is not the foreigner who pays the tax but the American purchaser; this fact was only one of many to give encouragement to the conference, for it begins to look as if a real tariff fight were at last in sight.

WHEN THE MAN who has been with the United States Tariff Commission since it was organized comes out in the public prints with the statement that Congress should not give the commission any more money, or confirm any more Coolidge appointments, until a thorough investigation is made, it is time to take notice. A federal office-holder praying to be denied his own salary! But that is the kind of man Mr. Costigan is, and for his courage and his high conception of public service The Nation stands at salute. The Tariff Commission was founded in 1916. It was to be a strictly impartial investigating body; it was to "take the tariff out of politics." Mr. Harding began its decomposition in 1922 with the "flexible provisions" program which transformed the non-political fact-finding body into an agency with power to raise or lower tariff duties. President Coolidge has kept up the good work and, as in the case of the Federal Trade Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission, has packed the Tariff Commission with his hard-boiled business friends who are about as impartial, about as scientific, as Signor Mussolini or the late lamented Diaz. All pretense of impartial fact-finding has disappeared in favor of Himalayan protection. Hence well and bravely does Mr. Costigan tell the American Economic Association: "Until adequate assurances are given that the membership of the Tariff Commission will be safeguarded by law, and will conform to the standards of disinterested public service, it is fair to ask that no further appropriation for the commission's work be authorized by Congress."

THE KU KLUX KLAN is rapidly sliding into a period of deflation. The latest evidence of its collapse was the decision of the Colorado Supreme Court in favor of Judge Ben B. Lindsey of the Juvenile and Family Court of Denver. Judge Lindsey has been fighting to hold his job against the bitter and open opposition of the Klan, which instituted proceedings to contest his election and to displace him in favor of the defeated Klan candidate. The contest was nominally initiated by Royal S. Graham, Lindsey's defeated opponent, and another citizen, Charles L. Laney. An attorney was engaged by the Klan. The case was first decided in Lindsey's favor by the district court, and Graham promptly committed suicide. Then an effort was made to appeal the case, although a new attorney for Laney filed a motion of dismissal with the Supreme Court. This motion was opposed by the original Klan attorney who wanted the case heard in "the public interest." The case was none the less dismissed and the Klan attorney is now suing the former grand dragon, Dr. John Galen Locke, for $500 which he claims was promised him when he consented to handle the fight against Lindsey. Thus everyone is discredited save only Judge Lindsey himself and the friends who rallied to the defense of him and his amazing court against the vicious but futile assaults of a declining Klan.

THE ANTHRACITE MINERS and operators have been in joint session at the Union League Club in New York City. They have been considering various plans put forward by Governor Pinchot and others to end the strike and bring peace to the industry. Alvan Markle—an operator—chairman of the joint committee, has laid a new proposal on the table. It calls for an immediate resumption of mining at the 1925 wage scale; a ten-year agreement barring strikes and lockouts; a fact-finding commission composed of three miners, three operators, and three members representing the general public. The commission is to employ a reputable firm of certified public accountants to investigate the operators' books and to determine profits and the ability to pay wages. On the basis of the accountants' findings the commission will then proceed to adjust the present—and future—disputes. The opening of the operators' books to the light of day is a cardinal concession. The miners must realize this even if they do object that the Markle plan is their hated arbitration in a purple nightshirt. Meanwhile the country has lost 27,000,000 tons of hard coal this year as against last, the miners have lost $100,000,000 in wages, and the operators an unknown amount of profit. But if the principle of a permanent fact-finding commission can be achieved, together with publicity for the accounting records, perhaps it will be worth the cost.

THE NEW YORK TELEPHONE COMPANY, having won a 10-per-cent rate increase, is modestly asking for 25 per cent more. Which may or may not have been a tactical blunder, for the announcement has brought forth a chorus which reverberates in Congress no less than in the locality affected. If experience is any guide, the uproar will be prodigious and the company will get the increase. But it may just be that one of these fine days the Bell system will overreach itself and wake up to find its lines federally controlled, if not taken over. The system is a natural monopoly; a competitive telephone industry has seen its intolerable day and happily passed; the accredited virtues of laissez faire have no place in the picture—painfully as this must tear Mr. Hoover's heart. It is just a great big 100-per-cent private trust, and to have any efficiency at all it must be a 100-per-cent trust—though the "private" is perhaps not quite so inevitable. Technically it has made good progress; lack of competition has not choked invention. Financially it has made even better progress; no stock is more sought after as a sound investment than that of the parent company. But how far this financial progress has meant inflating investment cost in the system as a whole; how far the margin between operating costs, as affected by continual technical improvement, and rates allowed by regulating bodies has been growing and has been salted down; and how far the supplies furnished by the subsidiary Western Electric enter into the picture—are largely unknown quantities. If we are to go on loving our little private trust, we would like to know just a bit more concretely why his cap is so often in his hand.

AN INSCRIPTION has been selected by the American Battle Monuments Commission to be placed upon the graves of our unidentified soldier dead overseas. It reads: "Here rests in honored glory an American soldier known but to God." It is about the kind of inscription one would expect in the circumstances. It could be much worse; and yet it could be so much better that one regrets it isn't. The phraseology is only a mumbling over of the words and ideas with which we drugged and befuddled ourselves in the World War. What a pity that instead of windy rhetoric we haven't the courage to blaze over those tragic graves something like this: "Here lies one of the youth of the world, raised to manhood by the blood and sweat of his parents, only to be sacrificed needlessly to human ignorance and superstition." That would be unkind, some will object, because it would say to those who lost dear ones in the World War that those deaths had been in vain. But actually it is the perpetuation of false ideas about war that makes its sacrifices useless. Could its mythology be dissipated in consequence of the world conflict, the soldiers known and unknown who perished in that holocaust would have helped in the greatest service ever rendered to mankind.

ON DECEMBER 30 the National Collegiate Athletic Association deplores commercialism in general, and the Tournament of Roses football game in Pasadena in particular, as "detrimental to the best interests of amateur sport." On New Year's Day the Tournament of Roses grandstand collapses, killing one and injuring 200 spectators. No connection between the two incidents has been established, but the second throws the first into high and terrible relief. Meanwhile the National Amateur Athletic Federation declares that "professionalism has come to be the bugaboo of American athletics"; that baseball among small boys has fallen off 50 per cent in the last three years due indirectly to the commercializing of the game; and that thousands of schoolboys under sixteen are engaged in athletics for money. Well, what do you expect, gentlemen? In a civilization where success has no other measurement than money terms, where the young are told in a thousand clanging tongues that the only road is the road that is lined with gold, it is inevitable that your labored distinctions between professional and amateur should be in the main illogical, impossible, and absurd. And all your rules and regulations, your deploring and viewing with alarm, will be about as effective as a water-pot in Sahara. You will get uncommercialized sport when you get a less commercialized civilization, and not before.

THE QUESTION of what a man's private affairs have to do with his public or professional career has come up again, this time in England with the expulsion from Cambridge University of J. B. S. Haldane, professor of biochemistry, because he has been correspondent in a divorce case. Professor Haldane is admittedly one of the most brilliant scientists in England, a man of extraordinary fortitude and resource, whose experiments, many of them made at the risk of his own health and even life, have saved the lives of hundreds of children and will doubtless save thousands more. Professionally, that is, Professor Haldane is not only talented to an unusual degree but he has performed remarkable feats of self-sacrifice, presumably with no other end in view than to help his fellow-men. There is no charge that his scientific work has suffered as a result of his private friendships; that work remains firmly established as original and of benefit to the population at large. But by some wholly illogical process of reasoning the gap has been bridged between Mr. Haldane's conduct in the laboratory or the classroom and his conduct after hours when his work is done, and the one is said to be relevant to the other. The divorce was evidently conducted in the quietest and most dignified manner permitted by England's abominable divorce legislation; Mr. Haldane is reported to be about to marry the young woman whose husband divorced her. But if the affair had been a public scandal, there would still be no logical connection between the two matters. The Cambridge authorities by their action have committed the university to a grave and unnecessary loss.

REAR ADMIRAL CASPAR F. GOODRICH, whose death occurred on December 26, was not merely one of the last links with the Civil War navy, in which he was an officer at seventeen years; he was also one of the most polished and charming of gentlemen, a naval officer who knew his business from A to Z, yet had nothing in common with the blatant jingoes who too often make the uniform a synonym for brag, bluster, and war propaganda, besides being puffed up by their own importance to the point of bursting. Admiral Goodrich was modesty itself. A scholar and a profound student, he was for years one of the most valued contributors and reviewers of The Nation. His high professional standing was shown not only by his services in the war with Spain but by his being selected to head for a time the Naval War College. If we must have naval officers, we wish that they might all be like Admiral Goodrich, or Admiral Sigsbee, or Admiral French P. Chadwick, or Admiral Cameron Winslow. To this group also belonged, of course, Admiral William T. Sampson. They were, and some still are, as able as modest and unassuming.

IF A GOOD MANY AMERICANS today do not know that the morning star and the evening star are the same heavenly creature and that her name is Venus, the reason may be that our calendar is based upon the career of a larger and more obvious body called the sun. An ancient Maya of Central America and southern Mexico had not this excuse for ignorance concerning the loveliest of the stars, because the calendar devised by his ingenious priests was a Venus calendar; any knowing citizen of that remarkable civilization was aware that five Venus years were practically equivalent to eight sun years, that eight days elapsed between the last appearance of Hesperus in the west and the first appearance of Phosphorus in the east, and that the morning of this first appearance in the east was a morning to be feared, since the light of Venus possessed the power to slay. If the last item implies the existence of what we should call superstition among the Mayas, their calendar, as recently explained and harmonized by Herbert J. Spinden of Harvard, is full proof of their sophistication in at least one realm of science. Dr. Spinden's researches, first announced by the Peabody Museum two years ago and now completed, seem to us quite as romantic as any ever undertaken by an archaeologist.

$2,500, Please!

THE Society for the Prevention of Crime in New York City having offered a first prize of $2,500 "to the author of the best program of practicable steps to reduce law-breaking in New York City," we hereby take up the challenge and submit our plan. So confident are we that ours is the best possible program that we claim the award here and now. It has the merit of calling for no appropriation and no new law or laws, nor for such a dubious device as the registering and finger-printing of aliens. Nor does it fall back upon that usual counsel of despair—the education of the oncoming generation. We make bold to predict that the result of its adoption would be not only an immediate decrease in punished and unpunished crime but would cause a toning up of public life throughout the land.

With this altogether modest introduction we come directly to the plan, which is simple yet revolutionary:

From February 1, 1926, all officials, whether of a municipality, a county, a State, or of the Federal Government, shall themselves cease from all violation of the laws, State and national, and of the Constitution of the United States.

There you have it! Is it not precisely what we claimed for it? What could be more revolutionary in principle and practice, since practically every sworn official considers himself superior to the law or competent to make exceptions under it or to waive it altogether?

Primarily, the reform would have to start with the White House. The President of the United States is one of our most flagrant violators of the Constitution inasmuch as he indirectly connives—like his recent predecessors—at the violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, which declares that no citizen of the United States shall be deprived of any of the privileges of citizenship by reason of his color or his previous condition of servitude and prescribes the punishment for any State which violates this provision. The disfranchisement of millions of our colored Americans brings the Constitution and the Government in Washington into contempt. It sets an example which is followed by many in the matter of the prohibition amendment. If any one clause of the Constitution can be deliberately disregarded without being repealed, why not all?

But this is not all. President Harding refused and President Coolidge has declined to carry out a mandate of Congress—that provision of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920 which requires the Executive to give notice of the termination of articles or provisions in commercial treaties to which the United States is a party which restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminating customs duties on imports entering the United States in foreign vessels and discriminating tonnage dues on foreign vessels entering our ports. It was never intended to give discretion to the President in this matter.

As for the Cabinet and the law, we have the spectacle of a Secretary of the Treasury who continues to hold office after it has been officially charged by an Attorney General that his aluminum trust is a law-breaker, while Senator Couzens's committee on improper income-tax practices declares that one or more of the Secretary's companies has been unduly favored by tax assessors. The recent Secretary of War stands revealed in the aircraft investigations as having offered to protect one of his friends against whom the law officers of the Government were about to proceed. Until Attorney General Stone took the headship of the Department of Justice that department was merely a conspiracy against justice, with Jess Smith, bribe-taker, having his office for some time next to that of Attorney General Daugherty. Since then its machinery has been prostituted by the malicious persecution and prosecution of Senator Wheeler at the behest of the Republican National Committee.

A reformation of the Cabinet would have far-reaching effect upon the administration of the criminal law provided that it carried with it, from the President down, an assurance that the Constitution would be upheld in the matter of free speech, free assembly, and the other privileges of the American citizen embodied in the Bill of Rights. Ever since the war—even before—these rights have been ruthlessly denied by mayors and by the police, as witness the Mayor of Wilkes-Barre who refuses to allow any meeting to be held except by sanction of the American Legion. Contrary to the Constitution or its spirit, laws against political opinions have been passed by numerous States. Meanwhile, the underworld of crime has watched the sending to jail of a Governor of Indiana, the effective impeachment of a Governor of Texas, and the ineffective efforts to impeach the present Governor, and has seen the present Governor of Illinois ordered by the Supreme Court to repay to the State some $800,000 held to be due the State.

The underworld has not only known of Jess Smith and Harry Daugherty; it has just read of the indictment of the former Alien Property Custodian, Colonel Miller; of the conviction of the head of the Veterans' Bureau, Colonel Forbes, and it entertains no doubt that if there had been an honest administration of the Department of Justice a number of Democrats in high office would have gone to jail soon after Mr. Harding took office. The underworld has read of the airplane graft—unpunished; the Government itself as violating international law in the seizure of German private property. It knows better than any other group of citizens how many officials are deep in violations of the prohibition law; what judges punish bootleggers and then deal with them; what court attendants can be "fixed." The inhabitants of the underworld see the little fellows like themselves being sent to jail. They know of only a few cases of "higher ups" going to prison, and they know of the special favors some of these rich convicts received while in Atlanta Penitentiary, for which the warden, chaplain, and other officials were removed. Why should they respect the law?

But where the acceptance of our plan would do more to check crime than anywhere else is in the local police forces. There are few in America which do not daily violate the law in dealing with men accused or suspected of crime. We refer to the "third degree"—a torture under which confessions are wrung from suspects after days and nights of hunger and thirst and brutality, until human endurance can stand it no longer. The Supreme Court has recently denounced this in one instance. Criminals know this and innocent people too. And everyone who knows it and knows how the police arrest Chinese by the wholesale, and suspects of every kind without charge or warrant, and, as in Philadelphia, under the dismissed General Butler, break into houses with axes on merest suspicion, must realize that there can be no respect for a law which is thus flouted by those sworn to uphold it. The underworld sees daily the misuse of the right to arrest for "disorderly conduct" or "vagrancy"; it knows to its cost how easily men may be "framed up." Prohibition squads in search of blackmail or graft deposit whiskey flasks in corners and then arrest the tenants of the apartments. Why, in heaven's name, should the youth of the land have any respect for the law when they see the law enforcers in a magnificent conspiracy to thwart justice or to warp it to their own uses, without the slightest respect for the law themselves, since they regard it merely as a means to their ends, good or bad? From prostitute, ex-convict, the weak, the degenerate, the helpless, the police take their toll.

We submit that nothing any vice or crime commissions or societies could suggest in fifty years could do more to stop crime in the United States than the reform we suggest. Physicians of the law, heal yourselves!

Futility

A CORRESPONDENT signing simply as "Newspaper Writer" calls the attention of the New York World to the epitaph on Frank A. Munsey printed in the Emporia Gazette and written presumably by its editor, William Allen White:

REST IN TRUST

Frank Munsey, the great publisher, is dead.

Frank Munsey contributed to the journalism of his day the talent of a meat-packer, the morals of a money-changer, and the manners of an undertaker. He and his kind have about succeeded in transforming a once noble profession into an 8-per-cent security.

May he rest in trust!

These are bitter lines, and the letter of "Newspaper Writer" is in the same strain. It says:

So far as I know, Mr. White is the only editor in the country who said what he really thought about Munsey. With the others who praised him so highly I have no quarrel. There was hardly anything else for them to do. The New York papers, your own among the rest, were competitors of Mr. Munsey. They gritted their teeth and did their manners, though they hated it. Other papers considered Mr. Munsey as one of the newspaper fraternity, although on what ground I do not exactly understand, and therefore gave him his garland of rhetoric and Latin. But what a spectacle!

I would sign my name to this letter, but I write it in behalf of scores of newspaper men I have talked with, and my name doesn't matter. Scores, did I say? I write it on behalf of every newspaper man in the United States.

All of which is an unusual and a terrible indictment of a man who has just passed. Yet those on the inside of journalism can hardly deny that it expresses a general sentiment. Behind the flamboyant printed eulogies have been extraordinarily bitter unprinted comments. Nor is this feeling based on personal grievance. Mr. Munsey's purchase and destruction of various old-established journals threw considerable numbers of men out of work and those who continued in his service knew him as a hard employer. But, after all, the men personally affected were few against the entire background of American journalism, and even the feeling of these few rises superior to a mere sense of individual grievance. What rankles is the conviction that Mr. Munsey commercialized and degraded a profession which, no matter how cynically he may talk of it to others, every newspaper writer loves—even if he cannot always respect it.

But while we understand this bitterness we do not altogether share it. To us Mr. Munsey's life seems more an object of pity than reproach. He had a talent for making money, but none whatever for comprehending the profession of journalism. He blundered into it as a mere means of making money and probably never realized that it was more to anybody else. Final proof of this appears in his will, one of the most pathetic testaments ever recorded. Never known as a particular friend of the Metropolitan Museum, or a lover of art in any way, he left the bulk of his millions to that gallery—apparently because he did not know what else to do with it. His life work, the chain of newspapers and magazines that he had acquired, a creation which normally should have been closest to a man's heart—all this he decreed should be sold and dissipated, treated as mere chattels. There was no plan for mutualization, no provision for carrying on his publications intact—or at all. Thus his life becomes the essence of futility and his passing illustrates the terrible tragedy of wealth in the hands of one who does not comprehend its use.

We are just as well satisfied that we did not write the epitaph "Rest in Trust." And yet—we are not altogether sorry that somebody else did.

The End of a Conspiracy

THE dismissal by Justice Bailey of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia of the indictment charging Senator Burton K. Wheeler of Montana with criminal conspiracy in oil-land cases finally brings crashing to the ground the case against the Senator which the Department of Justice built up after months of labor at an expense reported to be a quarter of a million dollars. From the beginning this was nothing more or less than a deliberate conspiracy to drive Senator Wheeler out of public life because of his investigation of the Department of Justice. It has now recoiled upon its makers. Those who are besmirched are the officials from President Coolidge down who connived at this conspiracy or permitted it to continue.

No one, no apologist for President Coolidge, or for Justice Stone who as Attorney General furthered the undertaking until his appointment to the Supreme Court, can deny that these suits had their origin with Harry Daugherty himself, aided and abetted by the Republican National Committee. The agents of the committee and of the department were deliberately sent to Montana to create the case. Blair Coan, an agent of the National Committee, declared that he went to Montana for the express purpose of "getting" the Senator. Senator Wheeler charges, and we do not think that his charges will be denied, that the Federal District Attorney in Montana, Mr. Slattery, was compelled to obtain the indictment by threats from his superiors in Washington. The Department of Justice did not desist from its course even after a committee of the Senate, headed by Mr. Borah, had reported upon investigation that there was no foundation for the charges. Every Senator present when the report was read voted to uphold it with one exception, and he voted No on a technicality.

After a delay of a year, during which time the indictment was used by the Republican National Committee and others as campaign material, the case was tried before a Montana jury and Senator Wheeler was acquitted. Meanwhile, the malice of the department had been manifested by the reindictment in the District of Columbia of Senator Wheeler and two associates, the idea being, apparently, to put the defendants to the greatest possible annoyance and expense by compelling them to bring their witnesses all the way from Montana. It is this indictment which Justice Bailey has dismissed as having no basis in law whatever. The District Attorney admitted that the law had been interpreted by him to mean what he thought was the intent of Congress!

Happy as we are that justice has been done and that the courts concerned have lived up to the best traditions of our judiciary, we do not think the case should stop there. In the last hours of the Montana trial the prosecution produced a New York lawyer of considerable notoriety who swore to a conversation with Senator Wheeler in New York City which the Senator had no difficulty in proving never took place. Now we should like to ask the Department of Justice whether it will proceed against this man for perjury? That will be an acid test of the sincerity of the Department of Justice, just as the use of this man was an illuminating example of how low the department could sink in its efforts to convict an innocent man. The episode is all the more unhappy since the prosecution went on under the direction of Harlan F. Stone, lately the dean of a great law school, a teacher of youth, and now a member of the Supreme Court of the United States.

A Confusion of Tongues

NOTHING today is more depressing—or stimulating, as the case may be—than the inability of certain divergent schools of poetry to understand one another. The inability in turn of the general public to understand any of the schools may be more depressing still, but that is another matter. I. A. Richards, the author last year of the most interesting volume of literary discussion to appear in perhaps a decade, “The Principles of Literary Criticism,” was deeply concerned over the widening breach between good criticism of art and the public taste. “With the increase of population,” wrote Mr. Richards, “the problem presented by the gulf between what is preferred by the majority and what is accepted as excellent by the most qualified opinion has become infinitely more serious and appears likely to become threatening in the near future.” That is true and important. Yet one may be almost as much concerned over the contemporary confusion of poetical tongues, a confusion resulting in the existence side by side in the same country or the same city of at least two kinds of poetry which are equally excellent and at the same time totally different—different in rhythm, in mood, in diction, in phraseology, and in subject matter—so that a poet on one side is quite at a loss to know what a poet on the other side is talking about.

A layman would probably say that only one of these sides had a case. To him it might seem that the only “difficult” poetry now being published was that represented by the books of T. S. Eliot. And it is true that Mr. Eliot presents his difficulties. Indeed, in a recent essay on the English metaphysical poets of the seventeenth century—the “difficult” poets of another generation—Mr. Eliot insisted that “poets in our civilization, as it exists at present, must be difficult. Our civilization comprehends great variety and complexity, and this variety and complexity, playing upon a refined sensibility, must produce various and complex results. The poet must become more and more comprehensive, more allusive, more indirect, in order to force, to dislocate if necessary, language into his meaning.” One result of this doctrine is, of course, Mr. Eliot’s “The Waste Land,” which, though annotated, remains incomprehensible to many highly intelligent poets who happen to belong to another tradition.

What the layman may not know is that the poetry which he would oppose to “The Waste Land” as clear and simple is neither clear nor simple to Mr. Eliot and his followers. He would probably oppose some sort of “nature poetry” to these verses which perplex him so sadly. But Mr. Eliot and others like him have gone on record as being unable to understand most of the nature poetry produced today, and there is no reason for supposing that their difficulty is merely pretended. For nature poetry has its own definite tradition, and the fact that this tradition seems to the layman to be the older of the two does not alter the circumstance that it too stems from a complicated and sophisticated—in short, a difficult—view of the world. The ideas underlying it may be conveniently if not finally traced to Wordsworth, who considered it necessary to write “The Prelude,” a poem 370 pages long, in order to elucidate these ideas and to defend them against a critical public which failed to comprehend them. Wordsworth is held sacred by a good many persons today for his simplicity. But so able a contemporary reviewer as Francis Jeffrey charged him with perpetrating “poetical paradoxes,” and felt that he “must ascribe the peculiarities of his composition not to any transient affectation or accidental caprice of imagination but to a settled perversity of taste or understanding.”

If many of us now disagree with Jeffrey, it is in part because Wordsworth is a great poet and in part because we have got used to him. But by no means all of us are used to him, and doubtless the rank and file of Mr. Eliot’s school do not even understand him. In the first place they are city men who have little or no acquaintance with Wordsworth’s material of mountain, shepherd, and lake. In the second place they are disposed not to believe with him that “man and nature are essentially adapted to each other,” or that “the mind of man is naturally the mirror of the fairest and most interesting properties of nature.” The mirror of their minds reflects a motley of shifting shapes rather than an ordered procession of forms. And why, they quite justly ask, should they be blamed for this condition?

Wordsworth’s instinct in the face of a complex civilization was to search with his imagination for a serene and luminous truth behind appearances. The instinct of these moderns is to play their fancy over confused appearances, disbelieving as they do in the existence of anything behind. Who can prove either of the parties wrong in a dispute which philosophy itself has never managed to settle? At any rate they will continue to diverge, and it behooves the layman, in so far as he may be interested in the matter at all, to study the exact conditions of the divergence—neither to resent too much the confessed difficulty of the Eliots nor to miss entirely the concealed difficulty of the Wordsworths.

Syria—Acid Test of the Mandates System

By EDWARD MEAD EARLE

THERE has been an unfortunate disposition to regard the bombardment of Damascus as a closed incident. Some overoptimistic friends of France have taken undue comfort in the recall of General Sarrail and the substitution for him of a High Commissioner, M. de Jouvenel. Friends of the League rejoice that the Permanent Mandates Commission has asked for a special report on the Syrian mandate; all that need be done, therefore, is to wait patiently until February when the new High Commissioner, like his predecessors, will inform the League that France is determined to fulfil her high mission of civilization among the Arabs. Meanwhile, Syrians are being killed for defending those Wilsonian principles of self-determination to which the Allies pledged allegiance during the late war.

A very heavy share of the responsibility for six years of military despotism in Syria, terminating in the vandalism of Damascus, must be borne by the League of Nations. One may be a severe critic of unimpaired national sovereignty and a bitter opponent of competitive imperialism, a friend of the League and of the mandates system, without finding himself committed to blind and unreasoning acceptance of every act of the League as ipso facto just and politic. Among the very worst enemies of the League in the United States are those who seek repose in the comfortable theory that the League can do no wrong, and by glossing over embarrassing facts miss many a fine opportunity to profit by healthy criticism. The effect of this is to substitute for an uncritical emotional nationalism an uncritical emotional internationalism.

It must be admitted that the task of France and of the League in Syria has been far from simple. The cardinal fact is that the French are not wanted in Syria; as to this, there can be no doubt on the part of anyone who reads the report of the King-Crane Commission or the manifesto of the Syrian General Congress of July, 1919. French colonial and military officials are inexperienced in dealing with a people as advanced and as high-spirited as the Syrians and have been inclined to treat protests as insubordination. Absorbed with other pressing problems of reparations, security, finance, and a costly Rifian war, France has fallen into the error of treating Syria as an unimportant colony, rather than as a mandated territory. In short, a situation faced France which required unusual tact, sympathy, and punctilious regard for native susceptibilities; she was obliged to meet it unprepared from every point of view—psychological, financial, administrative.

Nor has the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League been treading a path of roses. Its powers of investigation and recommendation have been sharply curtailed by the Council. Its outstanding friends have been among the smaller countries, whereas the principal mandates are distributed among the Great Powers, none of which is likely to rock the imperialistic boat. Even had it worked under ideal conditions, furthermore, the commission would have been handicapped by lack of precedent as well as by inexperience in the supervision of colonial administration.

Acknowledgment of the difficulties under which France and the League have operated, however, constitutes no justification for passing over lightly the record of the French administration or the negligence of the Mandates Commission. The French military administration in Syria has from the first been arbitrary, unsympathetic, and occasionally brutal. Rigid censorship of the press and schools, excessive and unwarranted use of courts martial, deportations of leading Syrians both Christian and Moslem, domination of Syrian courts by French judges, and failure to develop political institutions in the direction of independence are but a few outstanding instances of the manner in which the spirit of the mandate has been ignored. Furthermore, the use of Algerian and Senegalese troops under tactless officers has embittered Syrians and has brought the whole mandates system into disrepute. Perhaps the most damnable feature of modern imperialism is the manner in which the liberties of a small people are crushed out and its young men turned over to the tender mercies of a drill-sergeant that they may be prepared for the task of crushing out in turn the liberties of other small peoples. The use of colonial troops in the mandated areas should be prohibited by the League. A nation which undertakes the "sacred trust of civilization" involved in a mandate should not pass on to conscripted colonials the blood and sweat involved in the "white man's burden."

It is in the economic sphere that the French have been perhaps most negligent. In spite of the protests of every articulate local agency, Syria has had foisted upon it a depreciated paper currency adjusted in value to the rapidly depreciating French franc. In July, 1925, the Syrian pound had sunk to less than half the value of the Turkish pound, which had been the medium of exchange before and during the Great War. (Turkey, be it recalled, was prostrate in 1918 and has had none of the advantages of administrative assistance from Western Europe.) Little has been done to relieve widespread unemployment occasioned by post-war depression. Perhaps the best indication of the character of French rule in Syria is to be had from the following classification of public expenditures (in francs) from 1919 to 1922:

Education	6,300,000
Public works.....	10,000,000
Administrative expenses and charitable institutions	76,000,000
Maintenance of troops.....	1,782,000,000

To appreciate the widespread discontent in Syria it is necessary to judge the record of the French only by their own pledges. On November 7, 1918, the British and French governments issued a public declaration concerning the policies which they proposed to follow in the administration of Syria, Palestine, and Iraq. In the light of subsequent developments this declaration is as thoroughgoing a denunciation of French rule in Syria as can be found.

The end aimed at by France and Great Britain, in their carrying out of the war in the East unloosed by German ambition, is the complete and final enfranchisement of the peoples so long oppressed by the Turks, and the establishment of national governments and administrations drawing their authority from the initiative and free choice of the native populations.

To fulfil these purposes, France and Great Britain have agreed to encourage and help the establishment of native governments and administrations in Syria and Mesopotamia, which have been freed by the Allies, and in the territories whose liberation they are now pursuing, and to recognize these as soon as they are effectively established. Far from wishing to impose upon the populations of these regions any particular institutions, the Allies have no other desire than to assure, by their support and by an effective assistance, the normal functioning of the governments and administrations which the populations have freely given themselves. To assure an impartial and equal justice for all, to facilitate the economic development of the country by helping and encouraging local initiative, to favor the spread of education, to bring to an end Turkish political divisions, too long exploited, such is the role which the two Allied governments assume in the liberated territories.

Furthermore, by Article 22 of the Treaty of Versailles France pledged herself to consider the "well-being and development" of Syria "a sacred trust of civilization"; to exercise her authority in Syria as mandatory on behalf of the League; to recognize provisionally the independence of Syria "subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance"; to acknowledge that the principal consideration in the government of the country must be the wishes of the Syrians themselves. In addition, according to the terms of the mandate as drafted by the French Government and approved by the League, it was specified that all administration must be in the spirit of the mandate and that the organic law should be framed "in agreement with the native authorities, and should take into account the rights, interests, and wishes of all the population." According to the standards which they set for themselves, the French have written a record of failure in Syria.

Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations states definitely as regards mandates that "securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant"; that "this tutelage should be exercised by mandates on behalf of the League"; that "the wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory"; and that "a permanent commission should be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the mandates and to advise the Council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates." These are the responsibilities undertaken by the League. How have they been observed?

The French annual reports concerning the Syrian mandate, which the Mandates Commission has accepted, have been misleading and incomplete, if not inaccurate. Naturally enough the French administration in Syria judges the performance of its task by somewhat different standards from those of the Syrians or the outside world. The minutes of the Permanent Mandates Commission contain not the barest suggestion that there have been six armed insurrections in Syria since 1919. Petitions received from Syrians complaining about the character of the French administration have been returned to the signatories on the ground that the Mandates Commission is not authorized to accept petitions except through the French Government. In other words, Syrians living under an oppressive military rule must forward their complaints to the French High Commissioner at Beirut, who, until recently, was also the commander of the French troops; he in turn transmits them to Paris for submission to Geneva. It is difficult to see how under such a regime the Mandates Commission can hope to be informed about developments in areas for the administration and well-being of which it is held responsible by the Covenant.

It is rightly said that the most effective weapon of the League is publicity. Not a word of publicity concerning the present Syrian uprising has emanated from Geneva, as indeed there has been no publicity from League sources concerning five previous insurrections in which French casualties alone amounted to almost six thousand. If foreign property had not been destroyed, and if it had not been necessary to send foreign warships to Beirut for the protection of foreign lives, news of the bombardment of Damascus might not have reached the civilized world.

The foregoing criticisms of the French administration in Syria and of the negligence of the League are not altogether destructive. The League of Nations still possesses a great opportunity to vindicate itself and to justify the mandates system. A minimum program might be as follows:

1. The Council of the League should dispatch an impartial commission of inquiry to Syria to publish all of the facts in the case, rather than those which emanate from French and Arab sources. In adopting such a course of action, the Council would be following the precedents which it has set in the Graeco-Bulgar boundary dispute and in the case of Turkish atrocities in the vilayet of Mosul. Failure to send such a commission and to publish its conclusions will convict the League of adopting one standard for small nations and another for Great Powers.

2. The mandates system cannot succeed without the cooperation of the Near Eastern peoples, and their cooperation will never be forthcoming until they are convinced that their case will obtain an honest hearing. The League, therefore, should maintain a resident commissioner in each of the "Class A" mandated areas, including Syria, to receive complaints and petitions and to inform the Permanent Mandates Commission concerning observance of the letter and spirit of the Covenant. A precedent for such a course of action exists in the report of the Turco-Iraq Boundary Commission which proposes that a League resident be set up at Mosul on behalf of the minorities there represented.

3. The Permanent Mandates Commission should be given wider powers of investigation and recommendation in order that in future it may act before a scandal such as that of Damascus is allowed to develop.

If the League fails to do this minimum, it must be prepared to admit that the term mandate is a euphemism, little more than a new name for an old imperialism.

As for France, she likewise has an opportunity to restore her good name in the Near East. Already there are hopeful signs in the widespread admission in the French press and in the Chamber of Deputies that the bombardment of Damascus constitutes a national humiliation. It is also a hopeful sign that a civil administration already has replaced a succession of three French generals. But further steps are required. The independence of Syria should be provisionally recognized and a Syrian national administration should be set up parallel to an "invisible administration" of French advisers. A definite date for evacuation should be set, and every nerve should be strained to prepare Syria for self-defense and self-government by that date. Finally, France should adopt a generous and conciliatory spirit toward those Syrian patriots who, by struggling for their independence, have discredited a military imperialism and have given France and the League an opportunity to make the acid test of the mandates system.

The New World Court

By WILLIAM HARD

II. As Trap

THERE are just three differences, actual or alleged, between the old Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague, to which we belong, and the new Permanent Court of International Justice at the Hague, to which we are asked to belong:

1. It is alleged that arbitration is not really law. It is alleged that the old Permanent Court of Arbitration is not really a law court. It is alleged that the new Permanent Court of International Justice, in giving us law, in giving us judicial processes, will give us something which will be far superior to arbitrational processes.

2. The old Court is a flexible bench. The new Court is a fixed bench. The old Court consists of scores of judges from among whom five judges or three judges are selected by the contending nations to sit upon a given case. The new Court consists of fifteen judges who themselves decide which eleven of them or which nine of them or which three of them will sit upon a given case.

3. The old Court has no connection with the League of Nations. The new Court has numerous connections with the League of Nations.

I contend that this third difference is the only one which can really importantly actuate the American promoters of American entrance into the new Court.

I will glance at the first difference first. Is the old Court a law court?

I will begin by saying that it itself thinks that it is. The preamble of its constitution says that it is "desirous of extending the reign of law." Article 34 of its constitution says that its judges shall be "persons of known competency in questions of law." Article 37 of its constitution says that its judges shall make their decisions "on the basis of respect for law."

Its decisions in practice conform to this rule. Its decisions in practice are constructed exactly as the decisions of the new Permanent Court of International Justice are constructed. They begin by considering "the facts." They go on to considering "the law."

I will now quote from Sir Frederick Pollock, of England, second to no man in the world for labors in the history of law. He says:

An arbitrator is a person chosen to act as a judge on a particular occasion. There is no foundation for any notion that he is less bound to observe the rules of judicial conduct than are the judges of a permanent court.

I will next quote from Dr. John Bassett Moore, our fellow-citizen, member of the old Court, member of the new Court, equal of the best law scholars of any country. He says:

Arbitration is, and always has been, in international law, a judicial process.

I will finally quote from Professor Manley O. Hudson, of Harvard, formerly of the League Secretariat, our most perfected arguer for the new Court. He says:

Arbitrations have long proceeded along juridical lines. Whether a court is arbitrating or adjudicating, it will endeavor to find law that is applicable. The procedure of the Permanent Court of International Justice follows in broad outline the procedure before the Permanent Court of Arbitration.

The fact then is that this first difference between the two courts is so thin that it is barely visible in theory and virtually totally invisible in practice to many of the best eyes. Surely it does not at all explain the present immense mass propaganda for the new Court.

I come then to the second difference. In last week's article I touched upon it. I contended that no American President will ever go to the new Court with any important American question. I used, for illustration, the question of immigration. I will here use it again for a moment further.

Our immigration laws are offensive to many countries. Among those countries are conspicuously Italy, Yugoslavia, Rumania, China, Japan. On an immigration-treaty dispute, if we go to the old Court, we can at least be sure that three of the five judges will not be chosen from any of those countries. In the new Court we would find, on the fixed bench, fixedly confronting us the Italian Judge Anzilotti, the Yugoslavian Judge Yovanovitch, the Rumanian Judge Negulesco, the Chinese Judge Wang Chung-hui, and the Japanese Judge Oda.

Why pretend? We will not, in any important matter, go there. We shall regard these foreigners not as judges but as representatives of their countries.

I shall now on this point quote from M. Léon Bourgeois, of France. He was the first president of the Council of the League of Nations. He had been a delegate to the second Hague Conference of 1907. He had been a delegate to the first Hague Conference of 1899. In the observation of peace methods he was one of the world's most experienced veterans. In the first Hague Conference he discussed the idea of an international judicial fixed bench. He said that governments would not take important cases to such a bench. With a penetrating truthfulness which is as accurate now as it was then, he said:

The judges of a permanent court, however impartial they might be, would run the risk of assuming in the eyes of universal public opinion the character of representatives of their nations; and governments, believing that the court was subject to political influence, would not regard it as a disinterested court.

Of course!

The first difference between the two courts is nothing for either court; and the second difference is to the advantage of the old Court. I come now to the third difference.

When President Harding first suggested our entrance into the new Court, all our prominent pro-Leaguers said: "Ah! We are on our way to Geneva. Geneva is the sure next stop." Now they say: "Absolutely, there is no railroad between the Hague and Geneva."

Well, they are honorable men. I believed them the first time.

Let us continue to turn from theory and to look squarely at practice. Let us see what we actually shall be doing if we join the new Court with the Harding-Hughes-

Coolidge reservations. Let us see how long we could do it without becoming in full effect a member of the League.

We are to go to Geneva to help elect the judges of the new Court. Last time the League elected a judge of the new Court (Epitacio da Silva Pessoa, of Brazil), it did it in between considering, on a given day, "the protection of women and children in the Far East" and "the admission to the League of the Irish Free State." We are not to be present for these other duties of the League. We are to dash in, however, for the electing of judges. Perhaps the doorman will ring a little bell for us. The electing of judges being over, he will perhaps ring the little bell for us again. In any case we must then dash out.

But we must not dash far. Under the Harding-Hughes-Coolidge reservations we reserve to ourselves the right to have our say about any and all revisions of the constitution of the new Court. The League is the Court's creator and reviser. Efforts to revise the Court, either by direct amendments to its constitution or by the imposing of new strange duties upon it through multitudinous treaties filed at Geneva, are continuous. So, if we have sense, and if we wish to protect our interests, we must stay in Geneva all the time. We must stay and wait for the tinkle of the little bell.

Suppose somebody on the floor tries to revise the Court. In we pop. "Hold on," we shout, "we are members." Somebody interrupts. He starts proposing that Greece and Bulgaria shall not fight. He starts proposing that all wars hereafter shall be conducted by France or by some other first-class Power. The doorman gives us three sharp violent tinkles. Out we pop. "Wait, wait," we cry, "wait till we are out of sight. We are not members."

Then we go to our hotels, to wait for the bell; but how much, how far, have we really escaped? How are all elections, whether of judges or of other officials, accomplished? How are all legislative acts, whether creative or revisionary, accomplished? By negotiations. By bargainings. By givings and takings of extraneous benefits in order to accomplish immediate concurrences. That is politics, immemorably, unalterably. Are we political children? Are we political babies? Do we think that we can dive into one part of the pool of the League's work and not be swallowing water from its other parts?

If any such infantile thought should be in our minds, it will be dispelled as soon as we reach the Hague. We must go to the Hague. We must sit in the new Court. Our fellow-citizen Dr. Moore, sitting in the Court, will cease to represent merely the law and himself. He will represent the United States. That is why we are asked to join the new Court. It is not that Dr. Moore's decisions will improve. It is that behind him then there will be our official sanction, our official presence.

We sit in the Court and what do we do? We draw our pay from the League Treasury at Geneva. We look forward to our promised pension from the League Treasury at Geneva. And we spend three-quarters of our time not making any decisions of our own but writing out long opinions to send to the League at Geneva telling the League what to do and how to do it.

The new Court has handled sixteen subjects. On only four of them has it made decisions of its own. On all the rest of them it has been the mere attorney of the League. On only four of them has it made settlements. On all the rest of them it has made merely a legal diagram for the League to use, or not to use, in whatever settlement the League might choose to make, or not to make. In other words, the new Court has been a court four times; and it has been the League's advisory legal court-yard twelve times.

I pause to note that Elihu Root, regarding advisory opinions by the new Court to the League, has said: "They are a violation of all juridical principles." I pause to note that Dr. Moore has said: "The giving of advisory opinions is not an appropriate function of a court of justice." I then resume the human political aspect of the matter. We cannot give advice regarding the affairs of an institution and not be involved in those affairs. Imagine people who would come to you and say:

We know you do not wish to belong to our golf club. You have refused to belong to it. We accept your decision. We, however, are now about to appoint an advisory committee to advise us about our greens and bunkers and locker-rooms. We have thought up a way of separating you from the club. You will sit with the club in choosing its advisory committee. You will sit with the advisory committee in advising the club. You will help to say how the greens shall be rolled and where the bunkers shall be built and to whom the lockers shall be distributed. Thus you will have nothing to do with the club and be entirely free of all participation in, and of all responsibility for, its affairs.

What would you think of such people? Would you say that their proposition was a tricky trap or would you not?

But, in the case of the League, there is more ahead. Under Article 13 of the League's Covenant, the League has the duty of enforcing the decisions of the new Court. Some unruly nation refuses to obey a decision which we in the Court have helped to hand down. The League proceeds to try to coerce it. Then, under the Harding-Hughes-Coolidge reservations, what do we say to the League? We say:

My dear fellow! I'm so sorry! I really am so sorry that I helped to get you into this bother. But remember our bargain! I do not belong to your organization. I agreed only to sit on this bench—at the Hague—and shed my ink. When it comes to shedding blood, when it comes to enduring economic inconveniences, in order to produce respect for my ink-stand, under your system, why, my dear fellow, it is for you, and you alone, to provide the blockades and the troops.

I will ask any man, woman, or fourteen-year-old child in this whole country: How long could we abide in that refuge of the slacker and quitter? How long could we abide in the glare of that dishonor?

We all in our hearts know: Not one minute. The League system is a system. We cannot go into part of it and not find ourselves in all of the rest of it. Joining the Court, joining the League, joining "sanctions"—those three things are the same thing.

I contended last week that the new Court is a triple sham on peace. I have contended this week that the new Court inevitably traps us into an international organization which we thought we had rejected; and I have pointed out that it traps us into "sanctions," into coercions of sovereign states. I next week shall contend that it thus accumulatively constitutes a complete betrayal of the special international duty and destiny to which this country was dedicated by its founders.

"Suspicious Cal"

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, D. C., January 2

A COOLIDGE characteristic upon which no biographer or Mayflower magazine writer ever dwells is his inherent suspicion. Yet every man who has had intimate touch with him knows that to be an outstanding trait in the Coolidge of today. It is the natural and really inevitable companion to the quality of extreme caution which his most ardent and eulogistic admirers agree he possesses to an extent that long ago caused him to be called "Cautious Cal." There is fair ground for contending that caution and timidity are practically synonymous, but without pressing that point it is certainly true that suspicion is the natural accompaniment of either or both. No bold or impulsive man is suspicious. As he climbed, or rather was pushed, up the political hill toward the Presidency it was natural that this tendency with which Mr. Coolidge was born should increase. As what he got in the way of political honor and place seemed more worth while, a man with a naturally distrustful disposition quite logically concludes the number of those eager to take it away from him has proportionately increased. If the unfortunate Slep, who once walked so wide about the White House and dreamed dreams of a cabinet chair following a committee chairmanship, could be got to talk with complete candor on this quality of the presidential mind it would be a revealing and interesting discourse. However, he will do nothing of the sort, either with the spoken word or in the book on Mr. Coolidge which I understand he has published or is about to publish. But enough of that. The purpose of this article is not to analyze the Coolidge character but merely to make the point that his suspicious nature has thoroughly inoculated—or perhaps it is inherent with them, too—the little circle of New England friends who constitute his White House intimates and form what might be called his political Cabinet. The whole lot of them are suspicious, even the venerable Sargent. Scarcely an outstanding Republican in Washington but is suspected of secretly plotting to gain the 1928 nomination, and the thing has reached the point where after a hard day at headquarters, when they gather to talk things over at night, some of them see a candidate behind every tree on the White House lawn. While that, of course, is an exaggeration the remarkable thing is that to some extent at least these suspicions are fairly well founded. In Washington today a curious and seemingly illogical situation exists.

Nearly everyone active or interested in politics agrees that Mr. Coolidge will be renominated and probably reelected in 1928. Yet it is scarcely possible to move around town without bumping into more or less prominent Republicans obviously bursting with presidential aspirations or breaking into a conversation on the subject of somebody's candidacy other than Mr. Coolidge. It is equally impossible not to grasp the fact that the more important of the politicians of the President's party, those who wield the most influence and are regarded as leaders, while publicly predicting his nomination, hope in their hearts they are wrong and are anxious for an opportunity to sidetrack him. It is a strange contradiction—this insistence that Coolidge will succeed himself coupled with the active anticipation that he will do nothing of the kind.

The answer is this: the Old Guard leaders know perfectly well that if nothing happens to impair his present hold upon the people or break the practical unanimity of his press support, nothing can prevent Mr. Coolidge's renomination, and they regard, with some degree of logic, the 1928 Republican nomination as equivalent to election. In their opinion the Democratic Party will still be split in the next campaign and the Democratic ticket be what in ring parlance is known as a set-up. If things stay as they are there will, they agree, be no opposition to Mr. Coolidge for the nomination.

However, human as well as political experience teaches that things never do stay as they are. To these men who know the power of the propaganda upon which the Coolidge popularity is built, how it has been managed and upon what it has been based, who see him personally on matters of state and know his dependence upon his cabinet members—principally Hoover—who have the mental measure of this little Massachusetts group around him—to them it is incredible that his hold will last two more years. That it will not is their hope and their bet. It has lasted now a lot longer than a good many astute fellows thought possible. It is perhaps a fifty-fifty chance the break will come inside of two years, either through a cessation of the prosperity of which he is the totem pole or through some unexpected change in public sentiment. It is always possible the people may get fed up on the homely virtues and want something saltier. Or some crisis may arise which, the White House inadequately meeting, will turn the tide as swiftly against him as it now is with him. It is largely a matter of luck, but the chance is there of a break, and that is what gives vitality and importance to the present talk of other candidates.

The fact is there are more Republicans today secretly cherishing presidential hopes than in a long while. Some of them would surprise you. Our present President and his immediate predecessor have unquestionably encouraged White House aspirations in the breasts of men whose dreams in a previous day would not have reached that high. But now they ask themselves, "If Harding and Coolidge made it, why not I?" and immediately they begin to aspire, not openly of course—no one in his right mind would do that at this time—but none the less sincerely. Earnest disclaimers and equally earnest declarations for the good Calvin could, if they were cornered, probably be obtained from all of them, big as well as little, but neither the disclaimer nor the declaration would mean much.

The latest name on the list is that of Longworth. There is no doubt the bug has bitten the new Speaker. The poison is in his blood. Once in it can never be eradicated. In his case it is not to be wondered that he should think of himself as in the White House. He was, as he says, for a long time the Little Boy Blue of that establishment. Then consider whom he married. Consider further that the office he now holds is but two jumps from the Presidency. Consider, too, that he has, by reverting to the old Cannon customs, established himself not as a mere presiding officer but as the real House leader and dictator. Consider that for twenty years he was more or less a political nonentity; that he became in the last session a party factor and in this one is a party figure wielding almost autocratic power. That is stepping some for a Cincinnati

Congressman whose claim to fame up to two years ago was based on his marriage to a President's daughter. It is not surprising he takes the idea seriously. Why not? He laughs it off of course, but no kitten ever liked warm milk better than he the mention of his name in this connection. But all of them are like that no matter how indignant they pretend to be. Of course Mr. Longworth is not really a big man, but obviously that is no bar to the Presidency, and here in Washington at two large and important recent dinners he has been publicly boosted for the Presidency in such a way as to justify him in thinking about it for the rest of his life—and he will. There is no doubt of that. They all do.

In the meantime Mr. Coolidge has all the best of it. With thousands of appointments still to make, with the White House and Mayflower available for entertainment, with the press still loyal and true, there will be no nourishment in fighting him if things stay as they are, and no one is thinking of doing it. They will not oppose Cal if he is a candidate—but they devoutly hope something will happen to prevent him from being one. Far more than any Democrat, these Republican leaders would like to see him slip. Some are not beyond surreptitiously tossing a political banana peel in his path.

If anyone thinks the President does not know this situation and is not filled with dark suspicions, all it is necessary to do is to talk with some of these New England intimates of his who gather at night upstairs in the White House once or twice a week to report on what they have seen and heard during the day. They know a hearty cheer would go up from many Republican throats if Cal should come a cropper. If tears should be shed, they would be crocodile tears. Cal knows this, too, and the extreme caution with which he looks before putting his foot down these days is wonderful to watch.

Suspicious? He has a right to be.

In the Driftway

RELENTLESSLY the front line of "civilization," of "progress," of modern industrialism is being extended further and further into the ancient strongholds. Thus the Drifter hears from Japan that Tokio is bursting with great office buildings, that the streets are being paved and sewered, that taxis are competing with rickshaws. Sandwiched in between all this up-to-dateness, of course, are the little wooden shops, the brightly flowered kimonoes of the women and children, the stilt-like wooden shoes that click along the pavements, the ox-carts, the paper windows, the formal and exquisite gardens. Everything has not yet changed; but everything, it sometimes seems, is changing.

* * * * *

NOR is the Drifter the only one who deplores the new and laments the old. Exporters of fine Japanese handwork, of the brilliantly dyed silks and neatly worked embroideries, the little purses with bone clasps, the innumerable articles that are beautiful at least partly because they are unique complain bitterly that these things are becoming harder and harder to find. Foreign machine-made articles, painfully cheap and ugly, are displayed in their place, and proudly pointed to by the proprietors of the small shops. And it is difficult to explain to the erstwhile hand-workers that quantity production and a lower price will not recommend their new wares to customers. When Mr. Eli Whitney completed his unfortunate invention doubtless he was thinking, as he watched the cotton being ginned so many times faster than it had ever been done by hand, of the beautiful smooth cotton cloth that would result from his work. He failed to see the young children who would stand twelve hours in front of certain looms, the ugly, vulgar patterns that would take the place of those woven carefully and slowly by hand, the building of larger and larger machines and still larger factories to house them, the change from personal to impersonal industry, the long hours, the low wages, the years of strife between employer and employed, the group of men sentenced to seven years on the horrible prison ship "Success" for forming a little club to ask an increase of a shilling a week in wages. There is no reason why Whitney should have seen these things; doubtless if he had he would have deplored them—though he would not have destroyed his invention because he would have seen the benefits of a machine age also. But the change from hand to machine labor is always a painful one and many fine things are lost thereby.

* * * * *

LESS earth-shaking is the wail of the proprietors of geisha in Japan. The owners of these unhappy girls are put out because their charges are adopting short hair. They do not object on aesthetic grounds; evidently the customers have not yet complained. But the girls in some cases at least are saving enough money that they formerly had to pay to hair-dressers for elaborate coiffures to purchase their freedom. It is evident, say the outraged gentlemen, that if a woman is enabled to free herself from an obnoxious slavery simply by shearing her long black hair, business eventually will not prosper. Here, however, is one advantage of civilization that the Drifter does not condemn. If short hair is more comfortable, by all means let it be the fashion; and when it makes as momentous a change in the life of a young woman as he has described above, let it be advocated from the house-tops.

The Purpose of Plant Quarantine

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article Worms and Dutch Bulbs by Neil Van Aken in The Nation of December 16 so misrepresents the policy and practice of the Department of Agriculture in administering the Plant Quarantine Act that I feel constrained to present the actual situation for the information of you and your readers.

Mr. Van Aken devotes his article chiefly to conveying the impression that the quarantine on narcissus bulbs was imposed through the influence of American bulb growers and for the purpose of protecting their industry against foreign competition. In this there is not a vestige of truth. The impetus for the imposition of this quarantine came exclusively from scientists in the Department of Agriculture, who had become convinced through their studies that the pests found in narcissus bulbs constituted a serious menace. No suggestion looking toward a quarantine came from any American grower. Nor was protection of American industry against foreign competition in any way considered. This quarantine was imposed, as every other quarantine under the act has been imposed, exclusively for the purpose of keeping out dangerous pests.

The statement which Mr. Van Aken quotes from Dr. Marlatt, chairman of the Federal Horticultural Board, as to making the United States largely independent of foreign supplies, has its basis not in trade protection but in protection against insect and other pests. A further statement by Dr. Marlatt, issued February 26, 1923, explains this clearly:

A practical test over a seven-year period of the possibility of safeguarding plant imports by inspection and disinfection plainly indicated the inadequacy of this method, and the conclusion is forced that the only possible means of effectively lessening the introduction of new plant enemies is the policy of exclusion of all plants not absolutely essential to the agricultural and forestry needs of the United States. Carrying out this policy, quarantine 37 restricts the entry of most nursery stock and other ornamentals to certain purposes which are believed to be necessary to the development of American horticulture. Unlimited entry is permitted, however, of certain classes of plants which it is believed cannot at present be adequately produced in the United States, and provision is made for the entry of any other plant whatsoever for which a reasonable need can be shown, either for introduction of new varieties or for propagating stock not available in the United States, or for any experimental, educational, or scientific purpose.

Before deciding not to make the quarantine on narcissus bulbs effective until January 1, 1926, the Department of Agriculture endeavored to weigh carefully the probable infestation of American crops in the meantime by insects borne by these bulbs and the aesthetic loss that would be sustained by the public generally through being deprived of narcissi. The spread of infestation by insect pests tends to be slow, not rapid, as Mr. Van Aken seems to think, and the scientific authorities in the Department reached the conclusion that it was warranted in postponing the operation of the restrictions on the entry of these bulbs until 1926, to give opportunity for readjustments both in the countries of production and in the United States. Such postponement was further urged in order to make possible at least a start in home production so that the flower lovers in the United States would not necessarily be deprived of this popular bulb when the restrictions became effective.

Efforts have been made by various groups of persons to have the quarantine on narcissus bulbs revoked, and much money has been spent in propaganda to this end. These facts, of course, do not affect the merits of the case one way or the other.

When I became Secretary of Agriculture, however, I determined to review the whole matter for myself. A public hearing was held, and I am now engaged in gathering authoritative scientific data on the situation. I have not reached a decision, but I can say that my decision will rest on answers to three questions, and on nothing else:

1. Do imported narcissus bulbs carry pests which menace American agriculture and horticulture?
2. If so, have methods been devised and put into effect whereby these pests will be removed before the bulbs reach the people of the United States?
3. If dangerous pests are carried by these bulbs and are not removed before reaching us, are these pests already so widely distributed in the United States that their further entry will not materially aggravate the situation; in other words, that they are already out of control and that there is no longer any possibility of safeguarding any considerable portion of our territory?

The value of the Plant Quarantine Act and the soundness with which it has been administered are indicated by the fact that, disregarding altogether the narcissus controversy, only one important plant pest, the pink bollworm, has been found to have become established in the United States since the act went into effect, as against seven major pests that became established in the four years prior to the passage of the law.

Saintsbury

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article on Saintsbury, Octogenarian suggested a phrase to me. Not being vinous in my tastes, I follow Mr. Saintsbury more readily into the grot than into the cellar, but it struck me that much of the man might be distilled into a dozen words: Saintsbury—a man for whom wine is poetry and poetry is wine.

A Word on Women's Wages

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of December 9 Ruby A. Black closes an article entitled Jobs for Women with the words: "Nothing is easier than choosing statistics."

This dictum few readers will dispute. It is in achieving enlightening interpretation that difficulties arise. For instance:

Since the war the number of women who earn incomes large enough to be taxed under the federal income-tax laws has tripled. The total income taxes paid by the 813,819 women filing separate returns in 1921 was approximately $113,000,000, on net incomes of $2,098,028,624.

The actual increase in the number of women gainfully employed was a half-million between 1910 and 1920. But taking into consideration the increase in population, the proportion of women gainfully employed really decreased 2.3 per cent in the decade. In 1910 23.4 per cent of all women over ten years old were gainfully employed, while in 1920 only 21.1 per cent of the entire feminine population were earning money. Thus the increase in the amount of taxable income reported by women must be due to an increase in earning power.

The foregoing sentences from Miss Black's article raise puzzling questions. Is the reader to understand that "net incomes of $2,098,020,624," attributed to women for 1921, are earned incomes? The mere fact that separate returns are filed by women indicates nothing as to this unless the returns themselves show the source.

Owing to the increase of tax rates between the years 1910 and 1920, many women in the later years filed separate returns whose income in the earlier years was included with that of their husbands in joint returns made by the husband. In practically all these cases the income of the women is derived from investments and is not earned.

If, however, the $2,098,020,624 are earned incomes, why is the reader left in doubt? And if they are not earned incomes, what is the meaning of the last sentence in the quotation? For if they are not earned, they are derived from investments. These, in the case particularly of well-to-do women, are usually the result of inheritance or gifts. How then can they conceivably prove anything as to women's earning power?

Otto Carqué's Book Again

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Though somewhat belated, it is never too late to undo an injustice. And a most grievous act of literary and academic vandalism has been perpetrated—be it unwittingly—by the anonymous reviewer of Otto Carqué's book "Rational Diet," a monumental work of thorough scholarship and up-to-the-minute research. In a few flippant and trivial lines the reviewer disposes of a voluminous scientific work of a lifetime by one who is at once one of the pioneers and foremost students of modern dietetics—a science still in its 'teens.

That there can be no doubt of the correctness of my charge of injustice is self-evident from the reviewer's own words, which evince not only that he has not kept abreast, but is even lacking in the fundamentals of modern dietetics, a stripling science which is fast growing into the preventive science of medicine of the future: the only therapeutics worthy of the name of science. For instance, the reviewer betrays a shocking ignorance of the subject when he scoffs at the author's stressing of the essential dietetic import of the organic salts in foods, and characterizes as "medieval" the author's reference of the nutritional valency of foods to their electronic vibrations: the two outstanding achievements of modern dietetics, which such eminent scholars as Professor Sherman and the late Jacques Loeb, in this country alone, have respectively treated in their studies of the subject. In justice to the reviewer in question be it parenthetically stated that he is in this regard "at home" with the vast majority of our official "priests of health," the medical profession.

The "review" was a demolishing criticism of the reviewer rather than of the author, in so far as concerns those readers of The Nation who are grounded in the subject; but the injustice nevertheless remains as far as the vast number of lay readers are concerned.

The Influence of "House Organs"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The writer is one, perhaps among many, who has marveled at the decline of recent liberal movements and has sought a cause. Despite the report of a rise in membership of the American Federation of Labor for 1925, the first such report since 1920, ample evidence exists that the labor movement has suffered along with liberal political endeavors. Such recessions do not just happen. The supreme confidence of leaders of the National Manufacturers' Association at their annual meeting in St. Louis, Missouri, the week of October 26, left no observer in doubt as to who are the powers that are directing things under a benevolent Republican administration headed by Coolidge.

I say again, such things do not just happen.

A medium of publicity exists in this country which is, I believe, very little known and despite its relative obscurity wields a tremendous influence, politically and economically. I refer to the so-called "house organs," published by smaller and larger manufacturers and corporations. Thousands of copies of this class of publication are printed monthly and some oftener. With my limited opportunities of observation, being a typewriter, I have been enabled to judge quite a number of them, and especially during the campaign last year not one that I read could be classed as liberal. I am safe in stating that none favored La Follette.

Their circulation is confined to employees and, of course, they exchange with publications of similar viewpoint. The viewpoint is, as one may readily guess, that of the "Big Boss," and what he says goes. I have seen "editorials" in which the "old boy" told 'om plenty. Is it a far-fetched assumption to say that these dispensers of industrial and economic cocaine may be credited with bringing about the somnolent condition with which such large numbers of free and independent citizens are afflicted?

Astrology

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

With half the glittering heavens on his back,
He made a cheerful compromise with earth,
Holding no grudge against the zodiac
For having blazoned Virgo at his birth.
Out of a sky no longer comet-crossed
Or clogged with stars, he said, would come a sign;
And while he waited Life might well be lost,
Though all the kindlier planets were in trine.

Choosing between the jewel and the toad,
He somehow paltered, and we found a nook
In Time and Space for his enforced abode, Growing accustomed to his absent look—
His anxiously apocalyptic air
Of seeming to be neither here nor there.

First Glance

THE Tudor Translations, begun under the general editorship of W. E. Henley in 1892 and abandoned a few years after his death in 1903, were not only a delight to the scholar's eye and to the collector's hand; they were as well a series of documents bearing upon the whole temper of Tudor England. Few enterprises in modern publishing have been more inspired, and few sets of books are now more eagerly sought after by those who can afford them. For as one looked over those gold and red backs one saw in something like actuality the stream of foreign literature which poured into England during the sixteenth century and prepared, among other things, for Shakespeare. Certain of the items were of the first importance for the study of Shakespeare's origins—Sir Thomas North's Plutarch, John Florio's Montaigne, Sir Geoffrey Fenton's Bandello, and Lord Berners's Froissart. Others—like these, too, of course—had individual distinction; William Adlington's Apuleius, Sir Thomas Hoby's Castiglione, Philemon Holland's Suetonius, and Thomas Underdowne's Heliodorus are fairly permanent classics. But all were precious chiefly as being original exhibits of the Tudor genius, and in a peculiar sense they were themselves original Tudor books. More modern translations have in many cases supplanted them by being more accurate or more readable—Tudor prose, whatever else it may be, is not easy. They hold their places nevertheless by virtue of the zest and the joy with which they were undertaken. It is no mere illusion the reader has that North, for instance, believed he was writing his own book. For literary purposes it is a fact. And so with the other translators in that century when the literature of a swelling nation reached out to absorb all the best literature of the reachable world.

Now a new series of Tudor Translations is under way (Knopf: $8.50 per volume). The general editor is Charles Whibley. The format of the volumes is, so far as I can determine, precisely like that of their predecessors—something which happens all too rarely in this time of change. And the contents are all that might have been hoped for. In North, Florio, Berners, Holland, and a few others Henley had the cream of the field, and Mr. Whibley can hardly hope to find more men as mighty. But riches still remain, as can be seen by the twelve volumes thus far issued. I have handled only three of these—two containing John Framp-ton's translation of "Joyfull Newes out of the Newe Founde Worlde, Written in Spanish by Nicholas Monardes, Physician of Seville," and one containing "B. R.'s" version of the first two books of Herodotus. Monardes writes with boundless gusto of the medicines—sarsaparilla, sassafras, tobacco, china-root, cannafistola, tacmahack, cinnamon, rhubarb, vinegar, iron—which he was one of the first to take and test as they arrived at Seville on ships returning from the West Indies. "B. R.," whose full name will probably never be known, falls upon the father of history with a possessive enthusiasm which occasionally all but ruins his sense yet continually keeps him on a high level of reality. Never before, not even in Rawlinson, have I so much enjoyed the book on Egypt; no less to "B. R." than to Herodotus himself Egypt was a "newe founde lande," and the most was made of it. Of the other nine volumes in the new series I understand that four are devoted to James Mabbe's translation of Matheo Aleman's "The Rogue," two to Thomas Newton's Seneca (the tragedies), two to George Pettie's translation of Stephen Guazzo's "Civile Conversation," and one to Thomas Heywood's Sallust.

MARK VAN DOREN

Great Catherine

Catherine the Great. By Katharine Anthony. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

ONE expects a new biography of a famous historical figure either to present fresh material, the result of research, or to revise conventional interpretations of character in the light of the more modern psychology. Miss Anthony's study amply justifies itself on both counts. Furthermore, Miss Anthony portrays the empress with a keen eye for dramatic moments, with a convincing effect of continuity, and with a respect refreshingly tempered by humorous perception. The humor is casual and dry and effortless. "Altogether there were thirteen men with whom the empress made, so to speak, twelve unhappy marriages." After nine years of sterile matrimony with the ineffectual Grand Duke Peter, Catherine's ladies-in-waiting hit on the idea that the grand duchess might, by merely transgressing her marriage vows, redeem the situation and provide Russia with an heir. "It seems rather odd that all of them had been so slow in coming to this plan." Catherine's lovers "had been growing younger and younger until all the world expected her to end her life in the arms of a boy. So consistently had she lowered the age of consent, this seemed the only logical outcome."

But quotation must be resisted, for the humor is incidental, and the conception of Catherine's personality is not humorous. This conception is firmly based on the foundation of her childhood in Stettin, as the portionless princess of Anhalt-Zerbst. Letters, memoirs, diaries, unpublished even in Russia until shortly before the outbreak of the Great War, have made it possible to tell this significant part of Catherine's story almost in her own words. The deepest influence seems to have been that of her French governess, "Babet." "That is not common-sense" represented a final judgment with the governess as it eventually did with the empress. Everybody else in Fike's early environment dealt in moral principles and religious dogmas; Babet seems to have been a realist." Miss Anthony thinks Babet and her realism must be the key to much that afterward astonished the world in the Empress of Russia: her advocacy of vaccination, for instance, or her shockingly rational manner of developing her love affairs. This study of "Fike's" childhood helps to explain the success of the fifteen-year-old girl in establishing herself securely in the glittering and treacherous environment of the Russian court. And from Fike, journeying to Russia to marry the Grand Duke without even a bridal chest, to the aging and infirm and toothless Catherine the Great, making her unconventional exit to her bedroom after an evening at cards, leaning on the arm of her young lover, one feels a single developing personality. Whether Miss Anthony has the "real" Catherine or not—who knows what that is?—she has presented an absorbingly interesting human being, recognizable from childhood to death.

Among Miss Anthony's contributions to historical scholarship is the reduction of Catherine's lovers from a legendary three hundred to a meager baker's dozen, counting her husband, Peter; and the recognition that her son and successor, Paul, was a Saltykov, not a Romanov. Historians, aware of the doubt about Paul's paternity, have yet found so many traits in him of his putative father that they have regarded him as the son of Peter. Miss Anthony traces this puzzling resemblance to Paul's obsessions: he so feared being found out as a bastard and losing the throne, and so hated his mother—who returned the compliment—that he went in for a systematic imitation of the personal habits and tastes and abnormalities of the murdered Peter. And the ironic gods put the finishing touch to the performance by providing Paul with almost an exact duplicate of Peter's violent end. The psychology of Peter, of Paul, and of Catherine in relation to both is enriched by unobtrusive suggestions that the psychoanalyst will appreciate. In fact, every figure of importance is illumined by these flashes of the post-Freudian era. The most daring—and the most discreetly veiled—of Miss Anthony's interpretations concerns Catherine's puzzling love experience. All of her lovers were tall, well-built men who graced a military uniform; recalling the tall and handsome military officer who was her father, Prince Christian. And of her last lover: "his eyes wore that dreamy look which his predecessors all the way back to Prince Christian had always worn." "The woman who had had twelve lovers never learned to love."

A fascinating lady: whether dressed in uniform, oak leaves in her hair, mounted on a white horse, riding to seize her kingdom; or making a triumphal progress with Potiomkin to the Crimea, intoxicated with her dream of Constantinople; or protecting her adored grandson Alexander from botanical revelations of sex; or cleaning up the internal affairs of Russia with the dispatch of a German Hausfrau at her spring-cleaning. "Well-satisfied with all these cleanings, she wiped her hands on her apron and sat down to her silk embroidery. She was working on a gorgeous robe, with stitches as delicate and perfect as the Chinese can make them, to be presented to the Archimandrite of the Troitsky monastery."

Better than Textbooks

American Economic Life. By Rexford Guy Tugwell, Thomas Munro, and Roy E. Stryker. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.50.

America in Civilization. By Ralph E. Turner. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

MESSRS. Tugwell, Munro, and Stryker have provided for the student more straight facts and more sound sense about American economic life than we have ever seen gathered in equal space before. Instead of dreary and highly dubious laws about the economic man, marginal utility, and the canons of supply and demand, they have given us on a great canvas the physical picture of the economic background—soils, farms, manufacturing plants, cities, systems of transportation and exchange. Instead of the usual obeisance before the entrepreneur, they have proved that that nineteenth-century gentleman is no longer a factor seriously to be reckoned with in the going industrial structure. Instead of hymns to laissez faire, they trace the decline and fall of laissez faire before the onslaughts of horizontal and vertical combinations, gentlemen's agreements, and big business generally. They accept these combinations as less wasteful to operate, and on the whole an improvement—particularly if they can be controlled by public authority. Instead of pages of dialectics, they have given us a magnificent array of tables, charts, photographs, diagrams, and, to drive a point home deftly, cartoons. Instead of dull description of life at different economic levels, they have given us selections from "Babbitt." They are, in short, three militant exponents of the new school of experimental, quantitative economics; they face the world they live in, and they have given up the hopeless task of trying to bound it by the conditions which may or may not have obtained in Manchester seventy-five years ago.

We start with a description of rural and urban poverty (the lower depths), work up to the comfort level, the middle class, the professional man, and finally look in upon the regal splendors of the new plutocracy. This is the way Americans are living today, and we note the appalling gulf between Bayonne and Fifth Avenue. We go on to quantitative consideration of the economic plant through whose operation goods for consumption are turned out—agricultural production, factory production. At this point considerations of waste become very important. What are the limits of increasing farm output through a greater employment of scientific method; what the limits of coordinating and "balancing the load" in factory production? Nor is the population question forgotten. What is the number of mouths that the industrial system will have to feed in the calculable future? The authors doubt, giving due consideration to birth control, whether we shall run over 200 million. Particularly illuminating is the distinction drawn—following Veblen—between "industry" and "business." The former has to do with providing a maximum of sound goods at a minimum of human effort; its proponent is the engineer. The latter has to do with securing the maximum of profit in terms of price at the cost of whomever it may concern; it dominates economic life today, and its proponent is the go-getter. Then follows a section on raising standards of living by a more intelligent use of income, which opens up the whole vast field of wastes in consumption. Finally, all the major plans for fundamental economic adjustment are reviewed—socialism, cooperation, collective bargaining, government ownership, syndicalism, guild socialism—ending with a section on criteria for judgment of these proposals—tolerant, unprejudiced, and highly intelligent criteria.

But the concluding chapter leaves us a little puzzled—filled as it is with sweetness and light. Our economic system is a wasteful muddle; "86 per cent of our people live in poverty, while a few command an immense aggregate control over income that permits them to indulge in such extravagances as were never known in the world before"; we have advanced the technical arts to a place where, if intelligently directed, industry might provide the good life for all, but the intelligent direction is not forthcoming. Nevertheless our authors are optimistic. They come down like a ton of bricks on poor Scott Nearing for his skepticism; they deal severely with all "prophets of despair." They just know that everything is coming out all right. Without violence. Well, one can only hope to God they are right.

Mr. Turner's book is likewise a textbook, and likewise an extraordinarily good one. It lays before the student—and nobody is too old or too wise to be a student in the premises—all the major elements which fuse to make a nation's culture—culture in the broad anthropological sense. The roots of our religion, our history, our educational and economic systems, the growth and the current status of the physical and social sciences, the effects of geography and climate, the evolution of politics are admirably summarized and admirably presented. The book covers just about that quantity of information which a thoughtful and intelligent citizen desiring to keep up with the times should carry around with him as reachable mental equipment. One might even go so far as to predict that if the contents of this book did today constitute the intellectual equipment of all able-bodied citizens in America, war and poverty would be forever impossible, intolerance and superstition would vanish, children for the first time in the world's history would be intelligently and lovingly reared, the Ku Klux Klan would evaporate, Bryan would fall out of Olympus, tabloid newspapers would be unheard of, and national advertising would shrink 98.7 per cent. But the human ego would still have its Gethsemanes, and the unending warfare of the sexes would remain unabated.

A Novel in Images

The Grand Écart. By Jean Cocteau. Translated by Lewis Galantier. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

I SHOULD not be surprised to be told that the various manners of Jean Cocteau are now regarded as vieux jeux by the members of the latest artistic cliques of Paris, for though he was not born until 1891 he has already been more than a decade before the public. But to those Americans who know only by report of his ballets, "Parade" and "Mariés de la Tour Eiffel," who are not quite capable of distinguishing between the Mallarméenne, the cubistic, and the dadaistic influences which Frenchmen trace in his successive works, and who have probably heard of him chiefly through his connection with Éric Satie, he is indisputably "modern," the quotation marks about the word serving to indicate that it does more than place him in time, that it connects him vaguely with that international and heterogeneous group which includes all those from Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot to James Joyce and Gertrude Stein who are seeking some new form of expression even more ardently, perhaps, than they are seeking new things to express. His is an agile, a protean, mind which records its impressions in cryptically extravagant phrases, but his talent, whether great or small, is undoubtedly genuine, and the translation of this brief prose tale gives Americans an admirable opportunity to analyze and to judge him, for though its style is highly fantastic it is, unlike his verses, never other than comprehensible.

Perhaps "The Grand Écart" might best be described as a biographical novel written in imagistic abbreviation. Of its hero in his maturity it is said: "He summoned rhymes from one end of the world to the other, joining them in such fashion that they appeared to have rhymed since the beginning of time. By rhymes I mean—anything at all. Rudely he jostled names, faces, actions, hesitant remarks, stretching them as far as they would go." And this hero is at least the spiritual brother of the author, for such is the most accurate description of the style in which the book is written, a style, that is to say, which perpetually substitutes far-fetched but often strikingly apt images for any straightforward exposition. The setting of the first part, for example, is thus described: "Seen in the daylight, Venice is a sumptuous county fair shooting gallery in crumbs; at night, it is a negress in love, dead in her bath with her paste jewels." And when the author wishes to say that his youthful hero, having gone out alone one night, has a love affair and returns a changed person to a mother who does not know that anything has happened, he writes instead: "At the circus, a careless mother allows her child to take part in the experiment of a Chinese magician. He is put into a box. The box is opened—empty. It is closed again. Opened once more, the child appears and goes back to his seat. It is no longer the same child. But no one suspects that." The sister of his mistress resembles her "as a plaster cast resembles its marble original; that is to say that they were alike, save in everything."

The technique is thus one not wholly unfamiliar to readers of much modern poetry, and in prose we have something not wholly unrelated in the novels of our own Maxwell Bodenheim. For words and phrases which, worn slick by use, may slide over the surface of the mind are substituted metaphors so unusual that they cannot be comprehended at all except by a mind which keeps actively and thoroughly awake. The author, fearing the cliché, finds even the enigma preferable; and despairing of giving any connected account of his chaotic experiences in a chaotic universe he contents himself with dissociating all ideas and images from their usual companions in order to marry a few of them to new and unusual mates.

At its best this style achieves the brief, intermittent, and vivid illumination of a series of sky-rockets; at its worst it degenerates into a new Euphuism neither better nor worse than that fashionable Elizabethan style which depended upon similitudes taken from unnatural history and which measured its success by the distance from which a comparison was fetched. In a sense it is a confession of failure, of the author's inability to see any pattern in either the external or the internal universe and of his absorption in means of expression because of his inability to find anything really important worth saying for its own sake. It is, moreover, perpetually in danger of degenerating into a game of words, of producing nothing more important than such things as the following couplet from Hugo which fascinated the hero of the present book because, though it has no other virtue, it accomplishes the apparently impossible task of making the second line absolutely indistinguishable in sound from the first:

Gall, amant de la reine, alla, tour magnanime,
Galamment, de l'arène à la Tour Magne, à Nîmes.

As an old lady, bewildered by a discussion of this couplet, remarks: "All that, my children, does not alter the fact that this Gall was the queen's lover," and there is something to be said, even by a literary critic, for her insistence upon fixing her chief attention on content.

Yet it must be confessed that Cocteau uses this style in a manner which proves that it is by no means wholly an affectation, and unlike most he even succeeds in achieving a cumulative effect. His sufficiently familiar story of a youth permanently wounded by the collapse of his first love affair has something besides its brilliant flashes, for it manages in a very surprising manner to move even while it dazzles. Frankly I doubt if major literature is ever quite so fantastic; no great and permanently important style has ever, I believe, broken quite so violently from tradition, and there is historically every reason for believing that such writers as Cocteau will seem in perspective stylistic sports interesting chiefly as the freaks of nature are interesting. Yet he is no impostor and no fool. Temperament and circumstance, his own mind, and the tendencies of his time have forced him into a means of expression whose limitations are narrow. And because of them he has written only effective curiosities. Yet he is a master at his own trade.

Conrad Aiken's Poetry

Priapus and the Pool. By Conrad Aiken. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Senlin: A Biography. By Conrad Aiken. London: The Hogarth Press. 3s. 6d.

MOST of Conrad Aiken's poetry has possessed an excellence unimpeachably its own. This excellence has been accompanied by others out of the poetry of several contemporaries—two poems by Mr. Eliot alone, "Prufrock" and "La Figlia Che Piange," have informed much of his work with an attitude—and one suspects that, after all, he may have received too much attention. Yet he has deserved some; for he is almost the only living American poet who has satisfactorily developed a personal experience within the obvious metrical possibilities of certain lyrical forms. It is probable that Mr. Aiken has written as many as a dozen distinguished lyrics—a surprising achievement for any one in that genre—but the key to his failures in the more ambitious schemes, like "Senlin," seems to lie in an explanation of his repetitiousness, of his diffuseness.

Mr. Aiken cannot with any conviction sustain an idea through its elaborations in a long poem. "Priapus and the Pool" and "Senlin" are collections of detached lyrics: the sole unifying character in such poems is the external pattern of a theme which remains, throughout, a point of reference and does not become an interior motivation giving the work form. Too often Mr. Aiken discards his sensibility to meet the demands of this pattern; and this means, of course, that since he rejects the rhythms of his own sensation his poetry seldom has internal rhythm and proceeds solely as a metrical contrivance. Thus there is a great deal of rhetorical padding in his work—which is to say, there is diffuseness. When Mr. Aiken cannot place his emotion in definite perceptions he scatters it with a decorative phrase:

Into the azure world I call my heart . . .

Complex states of consciousness and conflicts of powerful feeling he usually avoids by appealing to their supposedly cosmic implications:

Senlin, walking before us in the sunlight,
Bending his long legs in a peculiar way,
Goes to his work with thoughts of the universe.

"Universe" occurs too frequently in his poetry, and too significantly. But Mr. Aiken is indubitably the poet in his gift of pictorial visualization:

. . . the blue hills
Flashing like dolphins under a light like rain.

Only, he does not assimilate his vision with an emotion, with a subject-matter.

For Mr. Aiken, along with other gifted modern poets, has not found an important subject matter at all. Mr. Eliot has a pointilliste brilliance and at the same time his work is obscure in its totality; perceptually very sensitive, he cannot relate his sensation to a material more intimate than a philosophy of the present state of European culture, a subject matter that doubtless can never be comfortably elucidated by any American. Though now living in England Mr. Aiken is not appreciably aware of this problem in his poetry, but if he were, through even some very personal extension of it, his work might be at once less thinly diffuse and laudably more obscure. This is not said in the wish that he should become another sort of poet; simply that he needs, and deserves, to be a better one.

The Action of Alcohol on Man. By E. H. Starling. With essays on Alcohol as a Medicine, by Robert Hutchison; Alcohol and Its Relations to Problems in Mental Disorders, by Sir F. W. Mott; and Alcohol and Mortality, by Raymond Pearl. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.50.

In a state more ideal than our own—more ideal than any in Europe, for that matter—one cannot imagine legislators passing upon the question of prohibition without having gathered (and been guided by) such facts as are presented in this book. It is the product of a physiologist, a general physician, a neurologist, and a vital statistician, and each of these is preeminent in his particular field. "The weight of pertinent criticism," writes Dr. Pearl, at the close, "indicates that the consumption of alcoholic beverages up to an amount and frequency which in common parlance is called moderate (the precise measure of this amount and frequency probably varying to some extent with each individual) does not sensibly shorten the mean duration of life or increase the rate of mortality. . . . This conclusion is a statistical one. It may or may not be true for any particular individual."

Passion and Pain. By Stefan Zweig. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul. Bernard G. Richards Company. $2.50.

The ferment of the mind of man rather than his physical agitation forms the theme of these stories, which are, with one exception, detailed records of individual reaction to the dominating forces of contemporary life. The book thus voices an eloquent protest against the unsocial laws of society, but it fails to achieve complete conviction through the intense subjectivity of the characters who cannot emerge from self-pity to see universal futility. Stefan Zweig has shown in his biographical and dramatic work the keenest appreciation of psychic development and struggle through participation in communal activity; here he indicates the isolation possible to the spirit of man in the midst of exuberant life and the horror of this loneliness.

Peter the Czar. By Klabund. Translated from the German by Herman George Scheffauer. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

Merezhkovski's "Peter and Alexis" pales to a polite history beside Klabund's brilliant and impressive masterpiece wherein Peter the Great rouses Russia from her immemorial slumber by the ferocious energy of his cruel genius. It is an amazing synthesis of history and legend that does Peter's whole reign in a brief space of pages. It is a unique and miraculous work drawing to its heart all the lust and splendor of the great czar and all the frantic terrors and the dark sadism and the mystical tenderness of Russia.

Music

Two Parodies

MR. DAMROSCH had not been sure whether he ought to play the next number of his program, "Modern Music Pleasant and Unpleasant." He felt a sincere admiration for the composer's early works, but this—well, he would let the audience judge for itself; to my intense relief, for he had already exercised his usual unwelcome last-minute discretion and sacrificed two of the Schönberg "Five Pieces" to his own wit in speech and program-making. I, for one, should gladly have forgone his opinion that good music must express human aspirations and emotions, the love of father for son, son for father, brother for sister, and so on down the line; nor should I have missed "The Ride of the Valkyrs," which, though a stroke of slightly self-conscious wit, was not relevant, and "The Beautiful Blue Danube," which was not even witty. What, again, Loeffler's "Memories of My Childhood" had contributed to the occasion I did not know; and it had taken longer than the two Schönberg "Pieces" would have done. But there had been fine moments, and one had arrived finally at Stravinsky's "Ragtime."

In music as in literature parody is produced by the use of an idiom by one to whom it is foreign—foreign, be it noted, not through birth but through experience and training. Conversely, when an idiom is used, consciously or unconsciously, by one to whom it is foreign, the result, whether intended or not, is almost inevitably parody. The term is applicable, then, not only to Casella's "In the Manner of . . .," but to a great deal of seriously conceived music—most obviously to Kapellmeistermusik or such miserable stuff as Ernest Schelling's "Impressions of an Artist's Life," but even to some of the neo-classical parts of Stravinsky's Concerto and Sonata for piano. And, whether this was seriously conceived or not, it was applicable to his "Ragtime."

For the melodic idiom of jazz is distinctive, and needs, therefore, a composer completely at home in it to produce what is first-rate, i.e., first-rate of its own type. In the hands of Stravinsky, therefore, it resulted in parody. Listening to a jazz orchestra over the radio one hears one stereotyped melodic device follow another (I might include the equally stereotyped devices of orchestration) until all these devices, which together make up the melodic idiom of jazz, become indistinguishable and fade into an accompanying pattern without significance; and one is conscious only of the ceaseless percussion of the piano and guitar. It is this effect that Stravinsky reproduced by reeling off the clichés one after another, or rather, by barely suggesting them and superimposing these snatches on a too, too solid plunk-plunk-plunk-plunk. This became the sole reality; the rest, by the time the recapitulation started it all over again, was sheer nonsense; and the combination was a ghastly commentary in purely musical terms.

One might expect a similar result from the use of the idiom of serious music by a composer of jazz; and judging from Gershwin's Concerto for piano one would not be wrong. True, in selecting a form characterized by working-out, i.e., rhythmic manipulation of thematic material, Gershwin undertook only to apply to the melodic idiom of jazz the same treatment that is applied to the thematic idiom of serious music (the term melodic and thematic are used to express a difference, the significance of which I shall refer to later). But—and this is the answer to those who have been demanding such treatment for jazz—in so doing he undertook in effect to write serious music. For the difference in idiom, which is all that distinguishes a fox-trot from a Bach Bourrée ostensibly in the same meter, is, aside from the difference in melodic intervals (i.e., of pitch), precisely a difference in rhythmic treatment. That is, in the fox-trot every syncopation and rhythmic irregularity in the melodic embellishment only emphasizes the meter, implying it even when it is silent, as in the first languorous blues melody of the second movement of the Concerto; but in the Bourrée the meter is only a convenience for notation and performance, while first importance belongs to the melodic voice; and this, free of the slightest bondage to the meter, assumes in its original form whatever rhythmic shapes it pleases, which in the process of being worked out are further transformed and integrated into large rhythmic structures. As a result, while the themes of Gershwin's first movement were straight jazz, and, constrained by the necessity of later being worked out, not very good jazz, the working out of these themes had all the characteristics of serious music and sounded like it, except that in writing serious music Gershwin succeeded in producing nothing better than a rather poor imitation.

If on the other hand the second movement was first-rate, it was because, as a small form, it required no more than the few superb blues numbers that he strung together, quite indistinguishable in type from his blues numbers outside the Concerto. This is quite significant, for, as it happens, we find in serious music the use of folk-song limited almost entirely to small forms, in particular to the middle, lesser movements of symphonic works; and it has even been contended that the melodies of folk-music are not the stuff of which a sonata-allegro movement can be built since they resist the rhythmic manipulation to which themes are amenable, and that they have in fact been used for this purpose very little, if at all.

The significance of this is that the problem of American music and of its relation to jazz has been misconceived and misstated. From the fact that jazz is a type of American folk-music it has been inferred that it must provide the material for any serious music which is to be called American. But the definition of American serious music is, serious music—i.e., music in the European tradition—by an American; and even the few fragments left by Griffes demonstrate that this no more depends on American folk-music for its material than similar music by Europeans depends on European folk-music. From European precedent we may expect an American symphonic work to include jazz, when at all, only in its lesser movements, while the distinctively symphonic movements will be based on symphonic material. To write such a movement, then, Gershwin must, forgetting jazz for the moment if necessary, assimilate this material and the technique of handling it; in working with jazz, on the other hand, he had better forget about symphonic movements and their technique and apply to the material the treatment it suggests, of which he is already a master.

Drama

Of Revues

REVUES have, of course, their drawbacks. There are moments of "art" which are pretty painful, and there are bits of comic relief which do not always relieve; but on the whole I prefer them to the more orthodox musical comedies from which they sprang, and that for a very philosophical reason—they are that which it is their nature to be more perfectly and more completely. The essential nature, the true inwardness of musical comedy, I take to be neither music nor comedy but something more simple and more fundamental. Feeble drama and tepid music are but decorous excuses for the sensuous delights which the spectacle of rhythmic bodies affords, and the revue, recognizing the fact with an honest frankness, is built around bodies. It has no stupid plot to bore the spectator and its music is frankly no more than the music of the dance, but it offers as a compensation the swaying body and the nimble limb in all the greater abundance. Nor can I, for one, pretend to be shocked by the increasing nakedness which the last few years have developed. Whatever may be the tradition of the moment, whether custom provide knee skirts for the chorus or whether it permit, as it does at present, the most liberal display, the fact remains that the body, half hidden or wholly revealed, furnishes the essential element of the charm, and I see nothing gained for morality, though much lost for beauty, in pretending that anything else is true. What was called in my boyhood "a leg show" has all the vulgarity of the key-hole, but the frank nudity of bodies trained to rhythm has its genuine beauty.

The "Greenwich Village Follies" (Forty-sixth Street Theater) and the "Earl Carroll Vanities" (Earl Carroll Theater), distinguished from one another chiefly by the fact that while the former tends toward elaborate decoration the latter has more confidence in the effectiveness of bare skin, have the defects as well as the excellences of their class. The humor of both is rather elementary and forced, though Florence Moore contributes some good work to the "Follies" and Julius Tannen (not very ably seconded by Frank Tinney) has his amusing moments in the "Vanities." The former, moreover, has a few of those solemn and arty scenes which, I am convinced, are kept in revues only because a portion of the audience always dutifully applauds whenever it is bored, it being, as it is, accustomed to recognize art by this depressant effect and ready to grant that, since whatever is art is boring, whatever bores must be art. And yet, withal, both of these revues provide in abundance what it is their real business to provide. They are to a democracy what troupes of dancing girls were once to kings. Throughout history any king who could afford the expense and disregard the scandal has kept his company to dance before him; but then it was the luxury of a few, while today there is no one above penury who may not be entertained in the way that the potentates of Babylon and of Rome were entertained. If Solomon had his seven hundred wives his relations with most of them cannot have been very intimate. Their real function, I suspect, was merely to stage his revues.

Aside from these spectacles there were no productions of the holidays which call for much comment except that of the Moscow Art Theater Musical Studio, which again lavishes its great talents upon the production of "The Daughter of Madame Angot"—a rather trifling and faded French operetta with an undistinguished score by Lecoq. "One of the Family" (Forty-ninth Street Theater) is a farce comedy which tells the story of an Adams of Boston who finally came, through the aid of an unaccustomed cocktail, to make his own declaration of independence from his managing aunt. It is genuinely funny, though highly reminiscent of many previous comedies.

The Children's Saturday Morning Theater, under the imaginative direction of Clare Tree Major, is producing a group of plays which once a week delight an audience of persons from 4 to 12 years old. This venture has grown from an experimental amateur effort undertaken in 1922 to a serious repertoire theater using careful technique and professional talent. The present production, which will remain for several Saturdays, is a dramatization, remarkably satisfying, of "Alice in Wonderland." So far the plays produced and scheduled have all been fantasies and fairy stories—mostly classics.

The French Occupation in Syria

THE following summary of the French occupation in Syria was compiled by Nazmie H. Anabtawy, a native of Palestine and a Syrian nationalist, who is now studying law at Yale. Most of the charges against the French administration contained in this summary are based upon reports in the Arabic press.

The French occupation in 1919 was confined to the Syrian coast, the interior being governed by a national government headed by Emir Feisal, today King of Iraq. The French policy was to create friction between Moslems and Christians so that additional justification might be found under the pretext of protecting Christians for staying in Syria. The seeds of trouble were sown. The High Commissioner used to receive in formal receptions the Maronite Patriarch first and the Mufti of the Moslems second. French officers began to show favoritism to the Maronites. New disputes were created, causing the Druses in southern Lebanon to revolt, whereupon the French soldiers burned Mazrat Ash-Shouf. To bring pressure upon the revolting men, women in the village were forced to leave for Bait Addin, a government center, to be exposed to intolerable humiliation by colonial officers and soldiers. While the French were engaged in the aforesaid expedition, the same causes aggravated by misconduct of the French officers brought another uprising in the district of Husn Al-Akrad. Punitive columns were dispatched. A number of villages were burned in order to quell the uprising and at the end an indemnity of £50,000 in gold was imposed and collected. Similar events took place also in the Jebel Amel and Alaween districts. The term gold here is not void of its significance. The French instituted a bank called the Bank of Syria with a capital of 10,000,000 [French] francs. The bank issued over 200,000,000 paper francs without any gold backing. French money since the opening of the bank has depreciated about 50 per cent, so the Syrian loss for the privilege of sharing with France in its destiny is about 100,000,000 francs. The French policy then was to collect the gold from the country and ship it to France. To attain this result all taxes were required to be paid in paper and every taxpayer was obliged to go to the bank to exchange money for paper bills. Apparently this was thought to be insufficient, so all indemnities which were to be levied were required to be paid in gold. Al-Mukattam, a leading newspaper in Cairo, says that the French soldiers committed horrors. It is a fact that in collecting the indemnities soldiers entered houses, took everything they pleased, thus violating the sanctity of private houses, and confiscated property to be sold for a small price. When it is remembered that all that is used by farmers was confiscated, it will be easy to estimate the degree of the calamity.

In 1920 these conditions left homeless and penniless many persons who became bandits and roamed from one place to another attacking travelers on the highways and even villages to such an extent that it was difficult for the French Government to cope with the situation while engaged in a conflict with Turkey in Cilicia. The French attributed this to the National Government of Damascus, which at that time prevented France from using the Ryak-Aleppo Railroad to transport soldiers and arms to Cilicia. Finally General Gouraud sent an ultimatum to the National Government of Damascus on July 14, 1920, making the following demands:

1. Absolute control of the railway from Ryak to Aleppo.
2. The abolition of conscription.
3. Acceptance of the French mandate (though not given yet to France by the League).
4. Acceptance of Syrian currency (paper money issued by the Bank of Syria without any gold backing).

5. Punishment of offenders who were most compromised by their acts of hostility against France.

Realizing that refusal meant war, this was accepted by the Government of Damascus before the expiration of the time limit. Yet General Gouraud forced his way to Damascus claiming unreasonably that the answer had not been received by him. The Syrian army had been disbanded to execute the terms of the ultimatum and therefore it was useless for Syrians to fight or to remobilize their army in such a short time. It was a dishonorable act on the part of France to move its forces after the terms of the ultimatum were accepted on the ground that the answer did not reach its destination, though it was given to the French representative at Damascus. This invasion of Damascus put an end to the National Government there, and King Feisal left Syria for Europe.

General Gouraud, following the invasion, divided the country into several states, each one independent of the other, but all receiving their orders from the High Commissioner at Beirut. This action partitioning Syria was an attempt to isolate the anti-French elements, though such action was very harmful to the country.

The places burned by the French forces in 1920 were:

1. Part of the city of Antakya.
2. Village of Alhummam.
3. The two towns of Babna and Alhufeh.
4. Baniyas—an important town.
5. Five villages in the district of Lazkeyah and many other plantations.
6. Many villages in the district of Jebel Amel with the indemnity of £50,000 in gold imposed and collected by harsh methods.

Damascus also was forced to pay £100,000, following the invasion of the city by the French army. There seems to have been no occasion for the imposition and collection of this indemnity on Damascus except to inaugurate the French rule there.

In 1921, after these disgraceful acts of France, one of the peasant bands attacked the High Commissioner near Damascus. The official announcement admitted that the neighboring villages did not have a part in the attack, yet the newspaper Al-Balagh of Beirut, in publishing the accounts of the expedition June 23, 1921, gave a statement to the effect that "by order of the High Commissioner (five) of the neighboring villages were burned; their property was confiscated and sold." Many villages near Aleppo had been burned also.

In 1922 when Mr. Charles Crane paid a visit to Syria a committee formed of nationalists and notables headed by Dr. Shabbender, ex-foreign minister in the late Damascus Government, met him to show the Syrians' appreciation of his unbiased investigation in 1918 and to ask him to convey to America the Syrian protest against the intolerable conditions under the French. As the name of Mr. Crane is very well known in Syrian circles, due to his visit, a demonstration took place, whereupon martial law was proclaimed and leaders and notables numbering 436 persons, as stated by the newspaper Alimran of Damascus, were either imprisoned or banished. Among these was Dr. Shabbender. In the course of another demonstration at Homs five persons were killed by Senegalese soldiers.

In 1924 a French officer was attacked near Palmyra, whereupon the French authorities destroyed by bombs five villages. The women of the villages were outraged and 5,500 sheep were confiscated as indemnity. All this was because a person attacked a French officer. Arms were collected from Lebanon also. Officers intrusted with the task committed horrors which Al-Mukattam described as a "painful drama."

In 1925 the following events took place:

1. The bombardment of Damascus and the declaration there of martial law for fifteen years, with a large sum of money in gold and 3,000 rifles levied as indemnity.

YOUTH LOVES WITH A NEW hope of happiness, a different sense of responsibility,—Free Love is here.

Youth marries—tries marriage—enters it to establish a different family life than ever existed in the world before—in many instances a deliberately childless family life.

Youth faces divorce without fear.

Youth practices birth control—shall it be safe and healthful—or dangerous and unwholesome?

Youth brings new attitudes to the problems of crime and disease, to the physical, moral, mental life of our time.

Here is the first cross section of the life of the new generation in the Western world, given frankly, freely, unhesitatingly—given to us so that those of us who care may know what to do for the new social order that is arising.

Given us by the head of the world famous Denver Juvenile and Family Court, and illustrated by the most astoundingly dramatic true stories ever revealed in fact and fiction—about life, about men and women, in a vastly, inevitably changing world.

In one of the truly important books of our decade—a book as interesting as life, as important to us as our most cherished ideals—as valuable to us as the counsel of our wisest friend.

Into a literature which views familiar experience under the aspects of time and place comes a sinewy, sensual book, nourished, for a marvel, upon fantasy and intellection. . . . The book is inimitable for its metaphor, for its opulent rhythm, for its revolt against the 'atmosphere of jaded alright' . . . Shelley might have admired it. For, in his own words, it is an attempt to digest the calculations of science, to make them human, to use them as foundations of another mythology. . . . The originality of the conception, the triumph of pure fantasy, the marvelous handling of language here, are elements, each of which would, taken in conjunction, place the author among the most considerable persons in contemporary American Literature. 2. Destruction of part of the city of Hama and the imposition upon the inhabitants of £150,000 in gold as indemnity.

3. Destruction of sixteen villages and one town near Damascus.

4. Bombardment of eighty villages in Jebel Druse.

5. Before the bombardment of Damascus one of the reasons that stirred up the inhabitants was the exposing of nationalists captured and shot by the French. These bodies, strapped on camels, were paraded through the streets of the city.

There are many other complaints which His Excellency Emir Shekib Arslan, the representative of the Syrian nationalists in Europe, submitted on October 19, 1925, to the committee in charge of the mandates in the League of Nations, which may be summarized as follows:

1. The government passed a law raising the tax on real estate to such an extent that it was impracticable to transact business. People protested in vain. Finally they gathered and proceeded on their way to the Government House in a peaceful demonstration as a protest against such a law. Colonial soldiers dispersed the crowd by force, killing three persons.

2. The seizure of the Hejaz railroad, which is a line built by Moslems with contributions from the whole Moslem world. The seizure was without due process of law and was not temporarily made to meet any exigency.

3. The Department of Justice in Lebanon was amalgamated with that of France so that cases might be appealed, of course in the French language, to the courts of France. French justices were introduced into Syria and the French language was made the official language of the courts. Such an amalgamation from the Syrian point of view is an encroachment upon national sovereignty, especially since trials are conducted in French.

It is very interesting to Americans to know the expenditure of France in Syria. Mr. Loder in his book "The Truth About Mesopotamia" says that in "1920 the cost to France of civil administration in Syria was 185 million francs, of which 83 millions went to the budgets of the several Syrian states and 102 millions for expenses common to the whole country, including the High Commissioner's office." On the other hand, the expenditure for military purposes is enormous: from "118 million francs in 1919, during most of which year the army of occupation had been almost entirely British, the cost of the French forces jumped to 686 million francs in 1920 and 785 million francs in 1921. The budget of 1922 provided for an expenditure of 332 million francs for the maintenance of a force of 35,000 soldiers, instead of 70,000 previously considered necessary." Emir Shekib Arslan in an article written in the New York Times Current History, May, 1924, says that "France is at present voting 18,000,000 francs yearly as a secret fund for Syrian purposes. Last year the French Parliament tried to reduce this sum to 5,000,000 francs, but General Gouraud declared that with this sum he could not guarantee to maintain French influence in Syria. He was right, the Emir goes on saying, for with this 18,000,000 francs France subsidizes the newspapers, keeps many Bedouin chiefs from revolting, and supports thousands of spies in all parts of the country." But after all who pays this money? Syria. Article 2 of the text of the mandate for Syria provides: "... Nothing shall preclude Syria and Lebanon from contributing to the cost of the maintenance of the forces of the mandatory stationed in the territory." This means that Syria has to pay in part for the bullets and shells used in destroying Syrian cities and killing Syrian citizens.

The French High Commissioner in Syria acts as a small monarch, with unlimited executive and legislative powers. After a protest the Government consented to a so-called parliament, which is in fact nothing but a quasi-representative assembly, since the High Commissioner has power to veto the parliament's decisions and that body cannot even discuss anything unless the French authority permits it. It is curious that in the terms of the mandate there should appear not one constitutional limitation upon the powers of the High Commissioner.

Corruption in the departments of the Government does not need any comment beyond citing specific cases:

A bridge called Jisr Addamour was built during the Turkish regime for £8,000, Emir Arslan says. When it was carried away by a torrent three years ago a French engineer was charged with repairing it. It cost £45,000. When the engineer was accused before the court of justice all experts testified that the cost of repairing the damages should not exceed a few thousand pounds. But the case was dismissed on the ground that "a French engineer" could not be condemned on the testimony of a Syrian.

The noted Egyptian scholar and leader Ahmed Zeki Pasha after paying a visit to Syria investigating the conditions there has published a series of articles in Esh-Shoura, a newspaper of Cairo, citing many incidents bearing upon the conduct of the French officers in Syria. He said that a French officer in the custom house of Beirut has become a millionaire through bribery and when the matter was brought before the court the officer arose and said: "You cannot accuse me and if you do I will betray all your affairs." The case was dismissed. And the only punishment given was that the officer was asked to leave Syria for France with all the money he collected.

There are many other cases which, though they denote the corruption of the French officers, are yet amusing. Carbillet was a governor in Jebel Druse. Lieutenant Moreau was Carbillet's pet, and a certain cat was Moreau's pet. "Moreau," as the story is conveyed by Mr. Seabrooke to the American Press, "went to Damascus for the week-end. He locked his house and forgot the cat. The cat went prowling for scraps on the housetops of Sweda and never came back. A few days later the town crier of Sweda went through the streets beating the drum: 'An order from His Excellency the Governor. The cat of Lieutenant Moreau has been stolen. If it is not returned within twenty-four hours every household in Sweda will be fined one gold pound.'"

Such anecdotes may invite smiles to foreigners, but they are a source of suffering and misery for Syrians. The situation is not amusing. Syrian cities and villages are destroyed. Thousands are killed, honor is outraged, and property is confiscated. Many thousands roam from one place to another penniless and homeless. Tragedy and suffering are abroad in Syria, which has been the victim of so-called humanity and civilization.

The China Boycott

FROM its Swatow correspondent the North-China Daily News of Shanghai prints the following translation of a speech delivered by Chou En-lai, Chief of the Eastern Expedition Political Department, on November 12, 1925, to representatives of the Swatow Labor Unions.

China has suffered from the invasion of international capitalistic imperialism that dwarfs and suppresses the growth of her industries. The worst effect of this aggression is felt and experienced in South China, namely, in Hongkong, Swatow, and Amoy. The value of the trade between Swatow and the British merchants of Hongkong is at least $200,000 per day. If Swatow can follow Canton methods of strike and boycott, her importance will be on a parity with that of the provincial capital. The proof of this statement can be seen in the unusual apprehension felt by the Hongkong Government when the strike and boycott were first declared here, and the said government has attempted to break them up by hook or by crook.

Seeing that the Nationalist Government was determined to side with labor in its dealings with foreigners, Hongkong resorted to all conceivable means that might tend to the destruction of the Canton Government.

THE MOB AND THE SNOB

"To the man in the street, Mob and Snob are two distinctly opposite entities, one confined to strikers breaking windows, with whom our red blooded vigilantes know how to deal, and the other a purely exotic culture of nobility worship, from which we of the U. S. are (somehow) protected by the tariff."

"But Lothrop Stoddard's 'Revolt Against Civilization' appals us with a spectral Mob (man in the street incog?), no mere sporadic nuisance, but a threat of general destruction, unless we find means to circumvent it by Nordic protectorate (snob?) and birth repression applied particularly against non-Nordic tribes (mob?), whose consent is taken for granted."

Starting from this THE DECIMALIST makes out its case against the whole Mob-Snob (inferiority-superiority) complex, always epidemic, and proposes a definite cure to which both Radicals and Conservatives can with equal consistency subscribe. It will also test any reader's Liberalism though not his liberality, for the current number is free without obligation. Address:

In the very heart of Canton they instigated traitors like Ngai Bong-ping, Leong Hung-kai, Muh Sung, etc., to rebel. Here in Swatow they provoked the bandits. Chien Chiung-ming, Liu Chi-lu, etc., were the trained hounds of the Hongkong imperialists. To prove their faithfulness to their masters they instituted oppression here by dissolving labor unions, putting their leaders under arrest, and suppressing every kind of patriotic movement. Among those present there must be many who have had some thrilling experience of these brutes. In spite of this, however, you have pulled yourselves through intact—an achievement which clearly proves your valor and strength of character.

The Nationalist Government realizes that the best means of bringing about the real unification of China is to overthrow all forms of imperialism, among which the foremost is the Hongkong Government. Unless imperialism is overthrown completely it is absolutely futile to attempt any crusade against native militarism. In the dying commands of our late President, Sun Yat-sen, we find this theory vividly explained to us.

As imperialism is now recognized by the National Government as the real enemy, the Government will support the strike against it, and as the laboring classes have suffered oppression at the hands of this imperialism, they should cooperate with the Government. . . .

The Nationalist Government will do more than merely help the working classes; it will support them, encourage them, and direct them in their attacks upon imperialists. You may wonder why the Government should go to this trouble. In explanation I will tell you that the workers have in their hands the most effective weapon for the destruction of imperialism. This weapon as you can understand is the strike which you have instituted. . . .

How powerful the strike is! We have never had anything like it in our diplomatic history since the famous Opium War. It is because of this that the Nationalist Government is so anxious to help and support the movement in Swatow, so that the struggle may continue until the very life of Hongkong is wrung out of the colony.

We have firm belief in the effectiveness of the strike, and because of this immediately upon our arrival here we telegraphed urgently to the Canton Government and to the Hongkong and Canton Strike Committee to connect the movement here with their own and introduce a common policy for joint prosecution. Before these uniform methods of procedure are thought out, however, I should like to make the following suggestions for your guidance:

1. In dealing with foreigners: Continue the observance of economic relations with the British. British residents in China who are willing to obey Chinese laws and jurisdiction shall have adequate protection for their lives and properties. Those who refuse to put themselves under the control of the Chinese law shall be driven out of the country.

We strikers are not against the British residents as individuals; we are against their Hongkong imperialism. Beyond this, however, all our acts and movements should be highly civilized, because we are only at the stage of giving warnings and not at that of declaring war. We are not afraid of them, mind you, and we firmly believe that some day or other we shall overthrow British imperialism.

But there is American imperialism, Japanese imperialism, French imperialism, etc. You will ask, what attitude should we maintain toward these? We know that all these imperialisms are exactly alike in oppressing and plundering China, and we should therefore overthrow them all.

But for the present we shall deal with the British alone and give the American, the Japanese, and the French time to learn from the lesson being taught the British. Meanwhile they will be carefully watched to see what attitude they adopt.

If they should secretly extend supplies of food to the British, they will be treated in every way like the British. Their ships may run between Swatow and Canton, but they will not be allowed to touch Hongkong. By means of these tactics we are sure to hold the very life of Hongkong in our hands.

2. In dealing with ourselves: Under this heading I find that there are three things we should attend to at once.

(a) As rapidly as possible the exact number of laborers in Swatow should be ascertained. At present there is no one who knows the exact number. This is a bad state of affairs. Striking is not unlike fighting. If a fighter does not know exactly how many comrades he has with him, he is bound to be defeated. The same is true of labor unions. If a union does not know how many members it should enrol or has admitted, that union is bound to be weak.

(b) Workers on strike should be properly educated. They must be taught why they should strike and what effect their strike will produce on China and the world. If a striker understands by the term "strike" nothing more than receiving a few cents daily gratis there is an immense danger in front of him. Take Lin Chi-lu's troops, for example. They never had any proper training, and because of the lack of it they were defeated notwithstanding their anxiety to win.

In Canton we have many institutions for the benefit of the workers. There are the Laborers' Schools, the Pickets Training Classes, etc. Here in Swatow, the unions must arrange for the proper training of their members.

(c) Nowadays, where financial questions are concerned, in all our undertakings, we have a budget not withheld from publicity. By this we know how much we have to spend per day, how much we have left, and how long we can keep things running. If we only know how many subscriptions we have collected, and how much we have paid out, we are sure to be met by failure before we have gone very far. If a fair distribution of the funds is not attended to, you can never expect your members to have confidence in you. I am sure that you all understand this point very well, and I wish therefore that you would forthwith accord your very best and most prompt attention to this phase of the work.

THE OFFENSE OF LESE MAJESTE in the American republic is being rapidly developed by our courts and its penalties are being more and more clearly defined. Thus, in San Francisco on January 7, William E. Wolfe was found guilty and sentenced to ten years in a federal prison for sending printed matter "indirectly threatening the President." It is, therefore, not only a crime to threaten the President directly, but if a judge thinks that the prisoner had such an intention a man may be sent to jail. This makes the lèse majesté laws of Kaiser William seem the work of a piker. In Manila the dignity of our satrap, Leonard Wood, has been upheld by the sentencing to prison for two months of a member of the Manila City Council on the charge of having used "insolent language" toward the Governor General in speeches in the political campaign last June. Speaking in the Tagalog dialect this man described General Wood as "a big tree without a shadow," a despoiler of Filipino liberties, an oppressor, and an autocrat. Representative Jones of Texas is old-fashioned enough to think that this is an outrage and to point out that in 1920 much stronger language than that was used about the worthy General in such American newspapers as had taken his true measure. Finally, it is now a crime to criticize the American Legion. Thus, Arthur F. Lorenz, editor of the Illinois Staats-Zeitung, has been sentenced to six months in jail for criminal libel of the Legion in general, no individuals being mentioned.

ATTORNEY GENERAL SARGENT did not distinguish himself on the witness stand in the aluminum-trust inquiry. At the beginning he testified that the first knowledge he had of the inquiry by his department was not "until I had been there five, six, or eight months." His attention was first called to it, he declared, by newspaper men. His assistant, Colonel W. J. Donovan, heard him give his testimony without dissenting. The next day Mr. Sargent produced a memorandum he had written to Colonel Donovan one week after he had taken office, directing his assistant to report on the inquiry instituted by his predecessor and to make nothing public until Mr. Sargent had passed upon it. This letter, the Attorney General explained, had made so little impression upon his mind that he had forgotten it. So apparently had Colonel Donovan, and so had those whose duty it was to prepare for Mr. Sargent's appearance before the committee. Thus the Attorney General's first excuse that he had left everything to his subordinates went by the board. Finally, he added that he had never heard that Mr. Mellon and his brother were the chief owners of the aluminum trust until he read it in the papers the other day. Vermont still cultivates rural innocence!

UP TO THE TIME of going to press the committee inquiring into the aluminum trust had not reached the question why the Department of Justice gave out a statement whitewashing the trust on the midnight before the New York World was scheduled to begin its attack which led up to the inquiry. It had been established, however, that the report of the special agent upon which the midnight statement was based, although giving the trust a clean bill of health, contained the flat statement that "the Aluminum Company of America enjoys a complete monopoly of manufacturing aluminum in America." It was also admitted by Colonel Donovan that, whereas the condemnatory decision of the Federal Trade Commission was based on documentary evidence, the agent of the Department of Justice was naive enough to base his findings upon personal talks with trust officials and others who were fully aware that the question might lead up to government prosecution. As for the refusal of the Federal Trade Commission to give the facts that it had obtained to the Department of Justice, the Attorney General himself could give no clear reason for this action except that he supposed it was to keep a confidence. Colonel Donovan devoted his main efforts on the stand to weakening the letter written by former Attorney General Stone declaring that the aluminum trust was a law-breaker. Finally, while these things were being brought out, the persistent Senator Couzens produced the fact that since Mr. Mellon had been Secretary of the Treasury that department of the government had permitted the aluminum trust to save $2,150,000 in income taxes through an amortization entry of $15,000,000 which Senator Couzens's expert declares to have been excessive and improper.

DEMOCRATIC LEADERS in Washington are behaving as if determined to make plainer than ever their incapacity for leadership and the folly of expecting any constructive statesmanship from their bankrupt party. The Republicans produced a tax bill favoring a handful of rich men. What do the Democrats do? Instead of producing a scientific reduction bill aiding the small taxpayer, they seek merely to outdo the Republicans in the total amount to be saved. That's what they call putting the Republicans in a hole. Their sole aim is to be able to go to the country and say plaintively: "Yes, the Republicans cut the taxes some, but see what we would have done for you had we been in the majority." As for the tariff opportunity, the Democratic leaders are bungling that as usual. In the first place a lot of them are at heart protectionists, and in the second place they seem to be united in not really desiring tariff legislation at this session or the succeeding session of Congress. They are merely raising the issue now as a sort of trial balloon for the congressional elections next fall. If it takes the air well then, it is to be the major issue in 1928. And this is called leadership, devotion to principle, and the determination to succor the tariff-plundered citizen of the United States at any cost! No wonder the party disintegrates daily and that a little awakening to its duties, like the action of Indiana Democrats in resolving against the dying K. K. K., is recorded as first-page proof that the Democracy is finding itself again.

IN WELCOMING HENRY BERENGER to America we prefer to think of him as the Ambassador of a great and friendly republic rather than as the journalist-politician who took the Czar's secret corruption funds to the French press. But the American people are entitled to the facts, and it is fair to remind them that when Boris Souvarine went through the files of the Russian Ministry of Finance, and found documents showing that from 1904 to the fall of Kerensky, Russia had been systematically bribing French journals and journalists, the name of Bérenger appeared on the Czar's pay roll. Details of this scandal were summarized in The Nation of February 6, 1924, by Lewis S. Gannett in an article entitled The Secret Corruption of the French Press. Nor is it pleasant to recall that Bérenger was Poincaré's man Friday in negotiating the post-war political loans to the Little Entente. Having thus assisted France in spending money which she could not afford, he now comes to America on the express mission of asking a generous settlement of the French war debt. And it is more than probable that he will succeed. After Caillaux went home defeated last year, we predicted that our Debt Funding Commission would eventually accept an offer no better than his. We renew that prediction now, and we think Ambassador Bérenger may not improbably be the man to fulfil it.

WE HAVE BEEN ADVOCATING for the past five years, as our readers will recall, a generous settlement of our war debts, both from the standpoint of justice and of our commercial welfare. Most of the attacks in Congress upon the agreements already made by our Debt Funding Commission are based upon wrong reasons, especially a misunderstanding of the finances of our European debtors in regard to which even our bankers are at times misled. We ourselves have criticized the debt agreements, but not because they were too generous. The trouble is, first, that the agreements are deceptions and, second, that the deception has become a condition for subsequent private loans to the debtor countries. Both the Belgian and Italian agreements call for trivial payments during the first few years, but impose severe burdens later. The early payments are stressed in the debtor countries in order to placate the people there; the later payments are emphasized in America in order to make our people believe they are getting their money back. Both peoples are deceived. The agreements will never be carried out. A few years hence easier terms will be demanded by our debtors. If their governments are sufficiently conservative to suit Wall Street, they will probably get them. Otherwise we shall set up a cry of repudiation and treat them as we have treated Russia.

MEANWHILE OUR BANKERS are getting deeper and deeper into the European situation and our government is preparing to wield the lash in their behalf. As soon as a debtor nation signs on the dotted line—no matter how deceptive the agreement—an open season is proclaimed in Wall Street to finance its government and its business. And these new transactions are not "war loans." The excuses that have been made for not paying the latter will not hold in regard to these new debts—the bankers will see to that. Nor will there be such low interest rates as the government has accepted. We do not say that these loans should not be made; those calculated to further productive industry or supply vital government needs certainly should be. But there should be no deceptions. As matters stand, we doubt if the Italian workers realize the new burden laid on their shoulders by the recent Wall Street loan, and we question if the market price of that security reflects the hazard to the American investor in underwriting a power-crazed empire-seeker like Mussolini. As for France, we are sorry that Ambassador Bérenger seeks a debt agreement. Having refused the Caillaux offer, we do not deserve another at this time, and in her desperate financial straits France cannot afford to make one. We should like to see her display the courage and the independence publicly to proclaim this fact, and wish she might, unlike other debtor nations, get on without further loans from America.

WHAT IS MURDER? The dictionary is fairly clear on the subject, but in California, where everything is not bigger and better is at least different from what it is everywhere else, the matter is not so easily determined. Twelve years ago one Richard Ford was convicted of second-degree murder in a case arising out of a riot in a hop-picking camp in which two officers of the law and two hop-pickers were killed. There was no evidence that Ford even had a gun on that occasion, though all the victims died by shooting. Yet Ford and a man named Suhr, who was not even seen at the gathering at which the men were shot, were sentenced to life imprisonment. The twist in this particular trial lay in the fact that Ford had once been a member of the I. W. W., and that he had led a protest of the workers against the abominable conditions at the camp. The issue in California becomes, then, the identification of the charge of murder with that of objecting to working conditions. In England a group of men were sentenced to seven years on a prison ship because they had asked for an additional shilling a week wages. To be sure, that was nearly 100 years ago, but California has not had time to catch up yet. Now Ford has been paroled after serving twelve years of his sentence, and is to be tried once more, in the same section of the country, with presumably the same prejudices, for the killing of the second deputy at the protest meeting. The prosecuting attorney is the son of one of the officers who lost his life, the judge has long been known as hostile to the I. W. W., there is no new evidence; the question again will arise: What is murder? In twelve years has California learned to answer this query in a new way?

IS THE WASHINGTON ADMINISTRATION trying to pick a quarrel with Mexico? There is every appearance of it in the sudden outburst from Washington by which an effort is made to stir public hostility against a friendly republic through newspaper propaganda rather than to adjust a possible grievance by diplomatic procedure. If proposed legislation in Mexico is contrary to treaties between that country and this, it ought to be possible to obtain a modification by friendly negotiations; if these fail such an issue would be admirably suited to arbitration. Certainly the threat to withdraw American recognition from Mexico is precipitate and unjustified. The noisy outburst inspired by the Department of State does not even make the point in dispute clear. There is a suggestion that Mexico's proposed petroleum and alien-property laws conflict not with treaties but with some sort of unwritten assurances which were the price of our recognition of the republic. We have no right to ask Mexico to live up to such "gentlemen's agreements," whatever they were, any longer than her people choose to do so. We may, of course, withdraw our recognition if convinced that we are the victims of injustice. But until the facts are known, and until diplomacy and arbitration have failed, it is preposterous that "Nervous Nellie" Kellogg should go bawling into the street with his nightmares.

CHRISTIANITY and the United Mine Workers of America are undergoing some weird adventures together in Oklahoma since the striking miners adopted the prayer meeting as the chief weapon of the picket line. First Governor Trapp sent troops to disperse the prayer meetings. Then, when the Criminal Court of Appeals held the picketing lawful, the operators went to the United States District Court for an injunction. Judge Robert L. Williams, basing his decision on Scripture, allowed the miners four pickets to each mine, following the verse in Matthew which says: "Where two or three are gathered together in My name, here am I in the midst of them." But it remained for the manager of the Milby-Dow mines near McAlester to apply the finishing touches to this exhibition of industrial Christianity. A group of miners gathered in a Negro church during the Christmas season and prayed for a speedy victory. An armed mine guard, with one companion, attacked the door with a crowbar when the congregation had departed. After taking possession in the name of the coal company the lock was smashed and a padlock put on the church. The key was turned over to the mine manager, who thus became the St. Peter of his little domain. He holds the key to the pearly gates and the strikers won't bother God with their prayers if he can help it. When God gave the coal to the operators He neglected to reserve diplomatic immunity for his vicars or extraterritoriality for His embassy, which happens to be on company property.

GOVERNOR "AL" SMITH'S eagerly awaited annual report is, he says, written exactly as if by the chairman of a company to its stockholders. In its general lack of interest, with one exception, it is completely on a par with the average company report. That exception is important and has already produced outcries from both friends and enemies that the Governor is becoming "too radical." In brief, his proposal is that the New York Legislature shall create limited-dividend corporations for the purpose of constructing on a large scale modern apartments for workers by use of the power to condemn land. We shall go into the proposal more at length in a subsequent issue; today we would point out, for the sake of those timid souls who see a Bolshevik behind every bush, that the Governor has advanced far more socialistic proposals in previous public utterances. It is not so long ago, in fact, that he advocated nine straight-out socialistic proposals in one message, of which one was the complete control of the milk supply by the State and another the beginning of the socialization of the medical and nursing professions. The Governor was not abused for those suggestions, although he has never since followed them up. We have a strong feeling that something worth while will come out of his latest proposal. Certainly, the housing situation for workers in New York is so serious as to call for drastic relief.

THROUGH THE GENEROSITY of William L. Clements of Bay City, Michigan, the American papers of General Sir Henry Clinton are to come to the United States. That is a cause for jubilation. As our readers will recall (The Nation, July 1, 1925), these papers were to have been offered for disposal at public auction. That would have been deplorable, for much of this material, including a manuscript defense of Sir Henry's operations in this country from his own pen, is unpublished, and is of extraordinary value to the historian, including as it does intercepted letters and dispatches of George Washington and other American generals. No such treasure trove of American history has to our recollection changed hands in the last thirty years. That it comes to the United States is due to the continuing interest in American history of Mr. Clements, who is the founder of the Clements Library of American History at the University of Michigan and donor of the building in which these priceless Clinton papers will find a permanent resting-place and be available for the student and the historian under the best possible auspices.

RECENTLY WE RECORDED the report that William Fox had arranged to finance several New York theatrical producers, and we commented upon the obvious tendency of such an arrangement to make the stage a mere feeder to the movies. We are glad to be able to add that the American Dramatists' Association took the matter under immediate consideration and that seventy-five playwrights, including the most successful and distinguished American writers for the stage, have signed an agreement to deal with no manager who claims the right to dispose of the moving-picture rights to their plays. The immediate purpose of the agreement is to protect the financial rather than the artistic rights of the author by preserving competition, but the incidental effect will be to make it much more difficult for any moving-picture company to exercise direct control over dramatic production. At the present moment the general policy of the moving-picture industry is to appeal steadily to the lowest common denominator of the largest popular audience, and we can think of no greater calamity which could befall the stage than that it should be brought into accord with this policy. The American theater has achieved a measure of freedom and there are a number of managers who are at least willing to make their appeal to a fairly select audience. They must not be swallowed by the gigantic and purely commercial organizations which are responsible for the films.

Rubber and Mr. Hoover

MR. HOOVER has just told the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that the United States was becoming weary of paying the extortions of foreign monopolies on rubber, coffee, nitrates, potash, jute, sisal, antimony, tungsten, nickel, asbestos, and tea. We import, he said, speaking in Erie, $800,000,000 of these products in a year, and a large percentage of the total represents not cost of production and distribution plus a reasonable profit, but a monopoly tax. Of them all, the "Stevenson scheme," whereby the British Government elevates the price of rubber, hits us the hardest and is the most indefensible. Better no bread than no balloon tires! Mr. Hoover has hinted darkly at reprisals. What if we should combine to force up the price of raw cotton or wheat or oil; how would the British like that? Meanwhile, Mr. Hennessey of Boston files a bill in the Massachusetts Legislature whereby it is provided that in return for the rise in rubber prices opportunity shall be given the burghers of Beacon Hill to boycott British insurance companies.

Now, the Stevenson scheme was born of dire necessity. When the rubber industry shifted from the culture of wild trees in Brazil to domesticated ones in the East Indies, all the problems of large-scale investment, of building the agricultural plant, of paying overhead on a crop which took six years to mature, came to the fore. You could not work when prices were high, and stop when they were low; you had to keep working all the time, and stabilization was imperative. The war demand increased the area of East Indian plantations drastically. With the world-wide depression of 1921 producers were faced with wholesale bankruptcy or concerted action. Not being willing to die for the sacred principle of free competition they called in the Government to act as concert-master. Perhaps Mr. Hoover would have died had he been there, hugging a copy of "American Individualism" to his heart. Perhaps he would not have. Anyway the British Government stepped in with this ingenious scheme of Lord Stevenson, whereby the 1919 output of each producer was made the standard, or 100 per cent. Up to 60 per cent of that output a low export duty of one penny a pound was demanded. Over 60 per cent the duties increased sharply, until at 100 per cent they reached one shilling a pound. The effect was a general restriction of production, but it operated horizontally on all producers, and not catastrophically by bankruptcy and abandonment. As demand increased—with a large and mobile output in 1923 and after, particularly because of the balloon-tire development—more rubber was sold at the higher percentages. The duty was accordingly stiff, was shifted to the consumer, and prices began to soar. From 17 cents a pound in 1922 they are up to $1 and over today.

The facts recited above call for two lines of philosophical comment. The first falls under the general head of the pot calling the kettle black—in which Mr. Hoover is obviously the pot. The second is more fundamental, and concerns itself with balancing the load of demand and supply in the international exchange of vital industrial products. It is in truth difficult to locate Mr. Hoover's and Mr. Hennessey's basis for moral indignation. If anything was ever devised to promote monopolistic extortion it is the present Republican tariff levels. Furthermore, since 1919, by a special and sanctioned breach in the Sherman anti-trust law, American corporations have been permitted to combine for the purposes of export trade. "Consider," says the Baltimore Sun, "the War Finance Corporation, set up by the United States and capitalized at half a billion, whose sole function and duty is to enable American producers to soak the foreigner. It is called by a sweeter name of course, but, practically, that is what it has effected. . . . While it may be perfectly permissible to fight the devil with fire, it would be a whole lot more honest to admit that in this game the British have taken a leaf out of the American note-book, and are doing the thing that we did for many years and are doing still." This may be putting it a little strong, but in principle at least the Sun is right.

This is grand "copy" for the headline artists, but it gets the wayfaring man in the British Isles no less than in these States precisely nowhere. Here are roughly a billion and a half people on this planet requiring certain basic products to keep their metabolism functioning—as Mr. Dorsey would put it. That metabolism is best served by maximum production—grown, mined, fabricated, and distributed—with minimum human effort. Whenever and wherever production is restricted below consumption needs, and distribution is bent into loops and circles by tariff walls and trade barriers, cost goes up, and the wayfaring man suffers. World economy on any such basis of common sense and straight-line engineering is, of course, beyond the capacity of those practical citizens who have world economy more or less in charge. In the calculable future one might as well call for the moon. But as one small step in the direction of common sense, the Stevenson scheme has much to recommend it. With no plan at all, probably half the rubber plantations in the East Indies would have been abandoned in 1921. The jungle would have made short work of years of intelligent labor. As demand increased, the survivors would have made unthinkable profits, while the lumbering law of free competition was clearing out the jungle and doing the capital outlay work all over again. With six years needed to grow a producing tree, the price of rubber would probably have been higher than it is now. Waste would have taken its terrible toll. The trouble with the Stevenson scheme is not with its basic principle but with the detail of its percentage rates. It overreached itself; it made for excessive restriction of output—far below world-consumption requirements. With no more administrative labor, export duties might have been set with balloon tires properly in the picture; with all the thousand and one uses which advantageously could be made of rubber, if it were cheaper, provided for. There is literally no end to the possible uses of a cheap and plentiful rubber supply. Meanwhile, as Ford has abundantly shown, there is as much money to be made by large sales at a small margin of profit as by restricted sales at an outrageous margin. If the British Government and the rubber producers of Malaya would pattern after Detroit rather than follow Mr. Hoover and his friends, they might conceivably do something to break the vicious circle, introduce a vital, waste-destroying principle into the chaos of international trade, and not lose a penny by it.

Peace by Persuasion

AFTER months of patient negotiation representatives of the organized railway employees and of the Association of Railway Executives have reached an agreement upon a program of legislation to supplant the labor provisions of the Transportation Act of 1920, abolish the Railroad Labor Board, and provide instead a less pretentious but more practical medium for railroad peace. The agreed bill was introduced into the Senate on January 8 by Senator Watson, as an administration measure; since substantially the same measure was pressed during the last session by a Progressive-Democratic coalition, the present bill seems certain to be enacted into law.

The Railroad Labor Board was established over the vigorous protest of all the railroad-union officers. Their prophecies of ill were not long in being fulfilled. The notion that the "public interest" could be safeguarded by the presence on a board of three politicians, chosen for their ignorance of railroading and labor adjustment and hence "impartial," was soon proved to be as unworkable as David Robertson of the firemen and enginemen had predicted. The precipitation of the shopmen's strike can be directly attributed to the way in which Chairman Ben Hooper and his "public" associates sought to handle the situation growing out of the board's drastic wage cuts. Every tradition of the industry and of labor relations in America was violated in the course of three hectic days.

The new proposal—the Railroad Labor Bill—is based upon the principle that the interest of the public in continuous and efficient transportation service can best be served by placing upon the parties directly concerned a duty "to make and to maintain agreements concerning wages and working conditions," and that whenever at all possible the differences between men and management must be adjusted within the industry by men who know its traditions and its special problems. Disputes of all kinds must first be considered in conferences (which are made mandatory) between the parties directly concerned. Disputes over grievances or the interpretation or application of trade agreements not adjusted in conference must be referred to the appropriate adjustment board. Any carrier or group of carriers may establish such boards, by agreements with the employees involved; the boards are to be equi-partisan and constituted of expert railroaders from both sides. During the war control such boards failed to adjust only twelve cases out of thousands handled.

Disputes over changes sought in wages or working conditions do not go from unsuccessful conference to an adjustment board, whose chief functions are interpretative rather than creative. Such a dispute over a change (which cannot be made arbitrarily and without notice, thus eliminating a frequent source of employee resentment and occasional strikes) may be referred to a Board of Mediation of five commissioners named by the President; or such board may intervene of its own motion and seek, by mediation, to adjust the dispute. An interpretation dispute not adjusted by a board of adjustment is also within the jurisdiction of such mediators, whose function is not to "decide" but to persuade. This method, under the Newlands Act which preceded the Railroad Labor Board regime, made the railroad industry the freest of strikes of any great industry. If the mediators are unsuccessful in securing an agreement between the parties, it is then their duty to induce the parties to arbitrate their differences. Arbitration is voluntary, but the award of arbitrators is made legally binding. If none of these measures is successful, the President may establish an investigating commission to ascertain the facts for him.

There is not a little humor in the fact that except for one relatively unimportant change (permitting local rather than requiring national adjustment boards) this measure, blessed by the Administration and introduced by none other than "Jim" Watson, is the same proposal which, as the Howell-Barkley bill, was fought with crusading fervor by the Administration in the last session. It is the same proposal which the railroad supply companies and special propaganda bureaus denounced to chambers of commerce throughout the West as "an attempt to force the closed shop upon the railroads." One inspired railroad president denounced it as "a dastardly attempt to sovietize the railroads." The truth is that even now the railroads would be glad enough to let railroad labor legislation alone if the antagonism and tension of the men, after almost six years of the Labor Board, had not reached the danger-point.*

Youth and the Church

IT is inevitable that the declarations of the thousand students who met recently in Evanston, Illinois, to discuss the church should result in some ecclesiastical uneasiness.

The few church leaders who addressed the conference brought out rather an amazing array of historical data to support the conclusion that Christianity, throughout its history, has almost always found regeneration at the hands of a critical and iconoclastic younger generation. It was pointed out, for example, that Christ's ministry found its support largely among the young men of his day and its opposition in the elders of Judaism. The Protestant Reformation and the Wesleyan movement began as youth movements. The foreign missionary program of American Protestantism—which doubtless has been the most vital expression of Christianity during the last century—began with a group of college students.

The most insistent of the demands was that for organic church unity. The waste of denominational competition and the interest in the preservation of denominational institutions at the expense of more fundamental matters were emphasized in every discussion. The fallacy of a Christian internationalism and interracialism that cannot begin with unity of denominations, particularly on the so-called foreign mission field, was equally stressed. The task of achieving organic unity was one which the students were willing to begin in their own relationships. Despite the protest of certain representatives of denominational organizations, the conference adopted—almost unanimously—a proposal asking for the unifying of all the young people's organizations of Protestantism.

A second project that was repeatedly stressed related to the program of "foreign missions." A report made by a commission of twenty-five students who had studied the missionary situation preparatory to the conference was adopted and calls for the placing of missions on a "mutuality" basis. This requires that churches on the mission fields shall be made autonomous; and that an exchange of Christian workers be inaugurated so that the entire program will cease to be a project of exporting American Christianity abroad and become an enterprise of Christian fellowship—with American Christians sharing their experiences abroad and Christians abroad coming to the United States on the same basis. It was proposed that this project be immediately undertaken by the students themselves through exchange scholarships.

It is altogether improbable that the drastic proposals of the Evanston conference will speedily be adopted by the Protestant churches. No such demand was made by the students. Every project was outlined in terms of what the students themselves, with or without older leadership, can undertake to do. The next six months will indicate, in some measure, whether they mean business, as it may indicate how far the ecclesiastical leaders of the Protestant churches are willing to modify their own schemes in the interest of winning the confidence of the thinking youth of the country.

Roosevelt vs. Wilson: Fourth Round

IN vain have we searched the sporting columns of our dailies for any contest or athletic struggle to compare with the race now on between the partisans of Theodore Roosevelt and those of Woodrow Wilson to give to the subject of their adoration the highest place in the American Pantheon. For skill, for enthusiasm, for devotion, for the refinements of the contest we know nothing to equal it. If our greatest sporting promoters were not so entirely concerned with brawn, they would certainly stage this contest of brains in the New Madison Square Garden in New York, with Hermann Hagedorn leading one team and Norman H. Davis the other—the winner to have 50 per cent of the gate receipts to swell his memorial fund.

Indeed we cannot exaggerate the national and international importance of the contest, for there has been nothing like it in history—this organizing, this raising of millions of dollars to perpetuate the fame of statesmen recently dead. Into the effort have gone all the arts of modern propaganda and a deliberate effort to surround the men with the aura of immortality by declaring that they were the immortals, by preserving at once all possible memorials of them—as was never done in the case of Washington, Jefferson, or Lincoln—by organizing perpetual celebrations, and by the publication of an unending Rooseveltiana or Wilsoniana, if we may use two dreadful words. No one can tell how far-reaching the effects of this competition may be; the example is sure to be followed abroad. So we look to see the verdict of posterity forestalled in the case of Lloyd George by a skilled Lloyd George Memorial Association, or in the case of the Kaiser himself. We have no doubt that if this new American technique of creating national heroes were to be adopted in the case of the exile of Doorn, who though dead still liveth, he not only could be made to reappear in the flesh but could be assured of a position with posterity second only to Bismarck's.

But we have wandered far across seas from the struggle which will make easy the hobbling and gagging of any future historical critics. We were moved to this expression of our thrills because of the holding of five hundred Wilson dinners on December 28, the anniversary of the great man's birth. That was a sockdologer, for Roosevelt's birthday was marked by only a few meetings, at one of which only a retiring police commissioner was the star—he talking of Roosevelt the police commissioner. The Wilson dinners were overwhelming in their array of talent. There were Newton D. Baker and Norman H. Davis, and Norman H. Davis and Newton D. Baker, and a lot of other ex-office-holders, and they made the welkin ring with their paeans of praise to their dead chief. They certainly put one over on the Roosevelt crowd, and we don't see why they shouldn't have five thousand dinners next year with Newton D. Baker and Norman H. Davis starring again like John McCormack in the annual New Year's radio concert.

That successful bit of strategy has evened the scales a bit and quite offset the great Roosevelt stamp victory. You haven't heard of that? Well, you see, the Roosevelt crowd went down to Washington and took the five-cent stamp away from a fifty-cent hero called U. S. Grant, who, some old fogies pretend, saved the Union on some old-fashioned Virginia battlefields long ago. Now every time you put on a five-cent stamp you play the game of the Roosevelt Association. So the Wilson crowd got busy. Sad to report, the only stamp they could capture was the seventeen-cent one, which is now Woodrow Wilson's own. It helps a little bit if we explain that the seventeen-cent stamp was not created merely to give stamp collectors another one to collect. The seventeen-cent stamp fits into a new device of the Post Office—put it on a letter and the letter is insured and you get damages or your money back without a fuss if the letter gets lost. That's something—when you think it might have been a thirty-cent stamp with Woodrow Wilson on it!

In the literary field we notice the Wilsonians have scored again. The Roosevelt Association is publishing about one book a year. 1926 dawns with the prospect of the reminiscences of David Houston, of whom it is said that he knew Wilson better and talked with him more often than any other man in his Administration. But this is as nothing compared to the astonishing news that Colonel House himself is to describe, by aid of a press syndicate, the most intimate details of his trips overseas as the loyal, devoted, and unpaid commissioner of Woodrow Wilson, called into service, so Bainbridge Colby says, by the diplomatic delinquency of Walter H. Page. There are two body blows for you. Don't they make up for the nasty posthumous attack of Henry Cabot Lodge? Don't they offset the 1925 volume on Roosevelt? More than that, the news that the 1925 Wilson prize was to have been divided between Austen Chamberlain, Briand, Luther, and Stresemann—the heroes of Locarno—until the Germans declined, shows how near the Wilsonians were to a publicity stunt to thrill the world.

Beside that the proposed Roosevelt Memorial for Washington would have paled; now it shines forth—a thing of exquisite, artistic beauty, most charmingly adapted to its surroundings and calculated to dwarf the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument. If the Wilsonians are to beat that they must raise more money than they now have and employ, if they can, still greater artists. We have confidence they will not neglect this field long, and if they enter it—well, for a sporting event this fourth round between the contestants will surpass the Kentucky Derby, the tennis championship, the Harvard-Yale game, and the World Series all rolled into one.

MUSSOLINI PROCLAIMS the second coming of the Roman Empire. Thousands of his enthusiastic countrymen decide to celebrate the event in a distant country.

ACCORDING to dry reports prohibition was a complete success in all our large cities on New Year's Eve.

A GERMAN BARBER applies for the vacant job of State Executioner, offering excellent qualifications and references. "Prosit," say we.

AN OFFICIAL BOARD OF INQUIRY has found that the destruction of the Shenandoah was due "to large, unbalanced, external aerodynamic forces." If we remember rightly our grandfathers used to call that "God."

NOW THAT "HAMLET" in modern clothes has proved to be a possibility, why not have Secretary Kellogg hire Horace Liveright and let him put on "Diplomacy" in the garments of the year of grace 1926 instead of the quaint neo-Elizabethan costumes now affected?

Wages for Wives

I. A Negative Report

By ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

MANY feminists feel that in these days of economic independence for women the position of a married woman would be improved if she received a salary for services. The question, therefore, of wages for wives is an irritating, if not a burning, issue.

The attitude of the average man was indicated by an inspector of elections who asked a voter her occupation. She answered, "House-wife." He wrote in his book, "None."

Two friends of mine married and, in the idealistic, emotional state induced by a honeymoon, discussed the question of future economic arrangements. The wife stated frankly and decisively that she was not the kind of woman who would be a parasite; that she wished to receive from her husband's salary, not an allowance but what she earned; to that and only that she was entitled. His income was about $10,000 a year. He regarded the proposal as whimsical rather than logical, for the relationship was not that of employer and employee. They were about to found a home. His duty was to provide economically. Yet he was delighted.

"My dear," said he, "if we put this on an economic or a wage basis we must consider the various capacities in which we work for each other. As the matter at present stands you take the place of all the women in the world to me. I am, therefore, hiring you as sweetheart, housekeeper, mother, nurse, female entertainer, interior decorator, supervisor of cook and chambermaid, and in various other capacities. Of course you are not entitled to the salary that each of these would earn because you are doing them all. On the other hand, you are hiring me as a lover, insurance policy, economic provider, chauffeur, escort, social background, and, in general, to perform those things that a man may perform. Since we are employer and employee, how much do you want?"

"Well," said she, "my clothes cost me a certain amount. I must have spending money. There are doctors' bills, and besides these are the household expenses, including rent, food, and service. These, of course, you would pay."

"But," he said, "since we are talking wages, the only effect of your needs is as to the amount you can afford to work for. They do not interest me as an employer. Let us take the first item. As a sweetheart you are invaluable but, frankly, I do not know whether I should pay for this or not. You would disclaim payment for services of that kind and, anyhow, I compensate since I am your lover. I assume that these services balance each other."

"No," she answered, "men have always paid their mistresses. It always has been the accepted thing."

"But, of course," he said, "you will give me the privilege of leaving you any time I choose or of stopping this payment and hiring someone else if at any time you should not be satisfactory."

Her answer was that at present she was quite satisfactory, that if he were figuring her economic value he must take into account all the services, whatever they might be, that she might render to anybody. When it came to figuring out the amount, however, they found themselves in difficulty. He insisted that he would give every last cent he had to have her as his sweetheart if he could not get her otherwise. She insisted, on the other hand, that as an employee she would work for one man in a position that pleased her at a much lower figure than for another. Finally they compromised on an amount of $2,000 a year.

"But, of course," he said, "out of your wages you would pay half the rent, half the doctors' bills, half the food, and half the service since these things are done for you as well as for me." She assented to that, but in view of the deductions the figure was increased to $3,000.

"How much are you going to pay me as a housekeeper?"

"What does a housekeeper do?" he asked.

"She supervises the cook and maids."

"But I can't afford a housekeeper as well as cooks and maids. Anyhow, it's a job that can only take half an hour a day, so why not throw it in?"

"No," she said, "we are trying to figure out a salary."

"But why should I pay a salary for work I don't need?"

"All right," she said, "then you supervise them, and fire and hire them, which, after all, is the chief part of supervision."

Beaten to it he finally inquired what housekeepers earn. She thought $75 to $100 a month plus board. "But then," he said, "they board at the homes of strangers. If they board at their own homes they pay for this themselves. Also I assume you intend to have our children around. The ordinary housekeeper would not have this privilege. We should fix the figure without board, and you should pay out of your salary your share of the expense for rent and living." The figure was fixed at $1,000 a year.

"Now, how about compensation as a mother?"

"Don't you want to be a mother?" he asked.

"Oh, yes," she replied.

"Then why should I pay for it?"

"Don't you want to be a father?" she asked.

"Of course I do."

"Why should I have all the bother, trouble, pain, nuisance, and care, and you have all the pleasure?"

"But how can we fix this unless we know the number of children. Besides, when one fixes earnings or wages one figures on market values. What would it cost a man to hire a woman to be the mother of his children? And since we are considering this from an economic point of view, children are an expense and not a profit. Your life would not be complete if you did not have children. It is the development and, perhaps, the chief function of a woman. But since I get some pleasure out of it and since, economically, I am not entitled to anything that I do not pay for, let's put this down at $500 a year."

"You haven't considered it fully," she answered.

"You are merely figuring compensation for motherhood."

In addition to that there is the bringing up of the children, acting as their nurse, attending to their clothes, and similar matters. I am talking about my total services."

"But probably you would want to hire a maid."

"But there are times," she said, "when the children will be sick. A hired nurse is at most an understudy. By the way, while we are talking of nursing, who is going to take care of you in off-periods? Suppose I should die and you had to hire a woman merely to supervise the education of the children and to take care of them when they were sick and to take care of you, you would be very fortunate if you could get any one for less than $25 a week, so that equitably there should be added at least another $1,000 a year."

"Well, have we covered it yet?" said he.

"No," she said, "there are still other capacities in which I serve you. I must act as companion and entertainer for you and your friends, sew on your buttons, do your shopping, and perform other miscellaneous services."

"Well," said he, "let's put that down at $500 a year. Now you have $6,000, or $500 a month. You are worth it. From this you pay half the expenses for rent, food, entertainment, automobile, servants, children's school, and clothes. Figure that at $300 a month. Then, of course, you pay for your clothes and presents and all life-insurance premiums since you are the beneficiary. That doesn't leave you much of a surplus. Besides, it leaves you nothing to pay me for my services to you."

"That is what I was coming to," she said. "Your half of the expense for rent, food, and the other expenses referred to above would be $300 a month. You would then have $100 left over for your own expenses. Instead of doing it that way, why not give me $500 a month to cover all home expenses? Out of the remaining $4,000 you pay your club dues, insurance, automobile, rent, doctors, and other incidental expenses."

"Agreed," said he. The "allowance" was fixed at $500 a month.

"After all," he said, "we are embarking on a joint undertaking—a sort of partnership."

"That gives me a thought," she said. "Why don't we jointly pay all bills and divide the surplus?"

"But I may need capital in my business."

"Well, let's leave it as it is. I'll save what I can out of the allowance."

Five years elapsed.

His salary had increased to $15,000. She was receiving $650 a month to take care of all home expenses. She always exceeded it somewhat and he made up the deficit. They had been reasonably companionable but she no longer met him at the door with a smile. There were two children. One could not exactly say that she was his sweetheart. She was herself, just a serious-minded, nervous, worried, and worrisome woman. He was a hard-working, tired business man. They took each other for granted. Either of them found emotional relief, outlet, or merriment in the company of others. She supervised the house, the servants, the care of the children, and did the shopping. His friends were welcome if they appealed to her; his customers never appealed.

"How about that theory of earnings?" he ventured one evening. "I've been thinking about it. The richer we are, the less work you do; the richer we are, the more you get. Ergo, the less the work, the more the pay."

"Money again," she replied. Any discussion about money matters resulted in an exchange of views as to all the differences that had existed between them from the time they were married.

He wondered whether his wife still thought she should receive merely what she earned. He remembered that the biggest item was paid to her as his sweetheart. He missed the cheerful humor and gay spirit which had been her greatest charm. He had no desire for other women, yet he lacked the buoyancy which comes from a live emotion.

Five years more elapsed.

His wife still received from him the same amount of money. Their lives had fallen into a groove. The house was where he lived; it was not a home. It was a place of gloom and irritated humor. He would have preferred to live somewhere else, at a hotel for instance, where people would wait upon him. At home he was merely the economic provider. Had he been a free man who was paying wages or compensation he would have handled the situation to suit himself. He reflected that there were no services for him which he wouldn't gladly relinquish were he an employer and free.

This situation lasted about a year. He left the house. He took a small hotel room. He paid $600 a month for provision for wife and children. He received nothing from her. He did not have the companionship of the children. She was supported by him because she had been or was his wife. He realized that he was spending several hours of each day working for her. Why should she be economically free while he slaved? He certainly was not paying for services rendered. He concluded that when there was no emotional interest left between husband and wife there was no further obligation on the part of a wife toward a husband, but society and honor imposed upon the husband a further obligation toward the wife. He willingly accepted the obligation, for after all they had loved each other and he was in a sense responsible for the course her life had taken.

Wages are compensation for services rendered. Irrespective of service, there are two theories on which a woman is entitled to support. When a woman marries she gives up the possible opportunity of marrying someone else at a time when she would best be able to do so. Just what this opportunity is worth no one can tell, although juries are left to fix some sort of compensation in breach of promise suits. What is a fair payment to a woman for voluntarily giving up a potential someone else in order to marry a particular man? The second basis on which a wife is entitled to support is that she has given up the opportunity of making her way in the world economically. Under present conditions the bearing and rearing of children and the taking care of a home ordinarily interfere with a paid job.

These considerations impose on the man the obligation to provide for his wife and this irrespective of whether their lives continue together or separately. A man undertakes this when he marries. The amount depends upon the circumstances of the parties and their needs.

If one does try to work it out from the economic point of view the question would be, What is the market value of a wife per year?—a calculation which has never been satisfactorily established.

Kawasaki Walks Out

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

Tokio, December 2

KAWASAKI, fifteen years ago a country village, is today a sprawling mill town. Great skylight factories squat in the mud, sprouting giant smokestacks. They are twentieth-century Japan, copied servilely from Manchester and Lawrence; not a line in them suggests old Japan—not a broad eave, not a pine tree, not a window frame. But away from the mills spread little wooden houses surrounded by mud and reeking sewers but spotless-clean inside; and the open shops in the winding dirt streets offer fresh fish and green vegetables, eighteen-inch white radishes and red segments of squid, gay cotton kimonos and little wooden shoes, great porcelain fire-pots and straw floor-mats—and these are as different from a Western mill town as the rickshaws of Tokio from their competitors the taxicabs.

Opposite the railroad station a group of silent men stand beside a long cotton streamer which pleads for money to help the strikers. Another group, with red armbands advertising their purpose, is passing from store to store, soliciting—and getting—contributions to the relief fund. Outside the mill gates of the Fuji Spinning Company lolls an impressive cordon of policemen; and behind the mill, beyond a brown army tent in an open field, are red flags, a gesticulating speaker, and a crowd. The black-haired orator shaking his fists at the sun; the attentive, upward-gazing faces; the restless policemen uneasily guarding the fringes—these might belong to any nation in the industrialized world. The flags and their inscriptions are copied from the West; the speaker is preaching the Western sermon of class solidarity—but the color of the picture is brighter here. A delegation of fifty girls from a Tokio mill has brought a contribution to the strike fund—and their scarlet and purple kimonos, their white-socked feet shod with straw geta, their infinitely elaborated hair-dressing strike the note of old Japan.

The crowded little houses suggest a doll's village. In one low-ceiled room twelve or fifteen feet square a family cooks, eats, plays, sleeps. One side of the house is built of sliding door-windows, paned with glazed paper. There is no clutter—these people use no furniture and own no goods to make a mess. They sit cross-legged to eat, and sleep on the straw tatami that make their floors. A single electric light hangs from each ceiling; sometimes an American alarm clock is the only ornament; cooking is done over charcoal in a porcelain fire-pot or on a wood fire in the yard. Toilet facilities are of the simplest. The tiny yards, inclosed by shoulder-high wooden fences, are deep in mud, but not one lacks a garden corner—sometimes a diminutive pine or cedar; more often a bamboo tree; occasionally a three-foot-square patch of radish. And always an outdoor fire-pit. I delay my friends when we visit strike offices in these workers' homes, for my footgear is what the Japanese call "five-minute shoes," and we could never enter on muddy soles.

Two of these little houses have been converted into rice kitchens. There is no soup for the strikers, but there is rice and there is tobacco, all elaborately rationed and carefully distributed on a food-card system. One might expect Japanese workers, new to organization, to be slipshod in these matters, but I have seldom seen a more efficiently functioning system. Three small wood fires have been built in hollows scooped in the mud. Great iron kettles, set upon bricks, boil merrily. A line of strikers' wives, babies carried papoose-like on their backs, wait patiently for the allotment. Supplies are late today, for the Tokio delegation is being fed—great round balls of sticky rice which require neither fork nor chop-sticks in the eating.

Here in Kawasaki, as in a hundred industrial villages of Japan, the Middle Ages meet the twentieth century. Here the old Japanese family system, face to face with the smoking chimneys of industry, is melting away; the religion of loyalty is dying; industrial class-consciousness is being born. This is almost the first strike in Japan in which women have played a leading part, but except for the gay sympathizers from Tokio the women mill-workers are invisible. I met one—a "modern" Japanese woman, who left her place as a primary-school teacher to work in a factory, and was among the sixteen workers whose discharge (after they had sought to form a union) precipitated the Kawasaki strike. The other fifteen were men. And when I first became aware of the presence of this representative of revolutionary modern womanhood she was on her knees, bowing her head to the floor in deferential greeting to each of the men present before she dared speak. When she spoke it was clear that she had a preciser mind and could tell more about conditions in the factory than any of the men present.

Three thousand girls are locked in the factory dormitories. Japan's spinning mills retain a link with feudalism long since outgrown in most other industries. City workers ask higher pay; they have absorbed something of the exigency of the West; so the Fuji company and its fellows send recruiting agents to the country, where girls are still simple-minded and docile. There they find peasants eager to borrow money with which to rent land—and contract with them for their daughters' services.* The company lends the parents money—perhaps eighty yen (about thirty-five dollars)—and the girls are its by a contract which amounts to slavery. The company agrees to pay the girls at the rate (in the Kawasaki mill) of 45 sen a day (about twenty cents); but out of this the girls have to repay fifteen sen for board and lodging, a half-day's wages a month for a "mutual-aid fund," and a varying sum as repayment on the loan. It takes two or three years to work off a thirty-five dollar loan.

These girls—anywhere from twelve to twenty years old—live as prisoners in the company dormitories; they rise at 4.30 in the morning, begin work at the machines at six o'clock; pause fifteen minutes at nine, half an hour at noon, fifteen minutes more at three; and stop at six.

* A report by Yoshisaka Shunzo, Japanese Director of Factory Inspection, published by the International Labor Office at Geneva, says that 610,000 workers are housed in dormitories attached to factories in Japan, and that more than half of these are "recruited" on the contract system. The system prevails in the textile, dyeing, and weaving mills, but is becoming more and more difficult to maintain as conditions in the dormitories become known in the rural districts. Girls can now be recruited only from the remotest parts of Japan.

The conditions may be judged by their demands in the Kawasaki strike. They asked (1) The privilege of going home when a parent or near-relative dies; (2) the privilege of seeing near-relatives who come to visit them; (3) that the money they save be not given to their parents without their consent; (4) meat or fish as part of their rations every other day; (5) permission to join the union; (6) reinstatement of the sixteen discharged workers. The Kawasaki strike was the first time that these little contract-girls from the country had joined in industrial revolt. Forty of them broke through the two hundred company guards one morning and joined the strikers outside the mill-gates. The others were driven back by sheer force. When the striking men paraded outside the factory walls the girls would try to climb up to the windows inside and would shout pitiful cries for help. Locked inside, they expressed their sympathy as effectively as they could; when the company introduced a radio concert to quiet them they refused to attend it.

At first the company spoke in terms which might have been translated from a Massachusetts mill-owner. "The company will forego its profits," it said, "and will even incur losses rather than have its own management policy infringed upon. The company will deal with individual workers at any time, but not with the union, for the latter does not represent its employees. . . . The company does not consider that there is any strike, but that the workers are kept away from work against their desire by an outsider in the form of the union." The national federation of spinning mill-owners met and indorsed the position of the Fuji company. But public opinion was against it—and he deceives himself who thinks that there is no such thing as public opinion in Japan. The Japan Federation of Labor brought help from the start of the strike; the Tenant Farmers Association sent 120 bushels of rice; the miners sent twenty organizers to help; a Chiba factory sent a bicycle corps of workers with a gift of 1,500 yen; from all over Japan donations poured into strike headquarters. The local merchants helped. A delegation of liberal Tokio lawyers, believing the imprisonment of the girls illegal, went to Kawasaki to interview the mill management, but could not get past the outside guards. Tokio newspapers protested. The district officials suggested a compromise. The police were friendly, although they obeyed instructions and barred sympathetic parades from neighboring towns. In the two weeks of the strike fifty or sixty workers were arrested, but most of the police interference was in connection with violent disputes between the members of the moderate Federation of Labor and the local Communists, both of whom wanted to dominate the strike.

Finally the national Government persuaded the company to make a settlement which was almost a complete victory for the union. The company agreed to improve the food and to permit the contract workers to see their relatives and go home on occasion; not to dismiss any employees for participation in the strike, and to pay the strikers one-third wages for the period they were idle; and while it refused to reinstate the sixteen organizers it agreed to distribute some 4,000 yen among them as "dismissal allowance and comfort money."

The paternalism of that settlement is, I think, as typical of industrial Japan today as the barbarism of the contract system. The twentieth century and the Middle Ages meet on every hand—in architecture, in clothing, in the souls of the people.

You can never tell what to expect from the Japanese Government. You can, I think, guess what to expect from the workers. Like the engineers, they are copying the West. Three words constantly recurring at Kawasaki I needed no interpreter to translate: "strike," "union," "sabotage." They have been adopted into the language and practice of the Japanese worker. During the last week of the Kawasaki walk-out a sympathetic strike broke out at a mill owned by the same company at Hodogaya, which turned into a significant movement on its own account. It was another women's strike, in which the women adopted the syndicalist technique of going to their machines, but sitting idle while the empty spindles whirled and buzzed. One of the Kawasaki workers who knew a little English called my attention to a group of cheerful strikers sitting in the sun singing. "Same song American I. W. W.," he said; and, sure enough, the tune was Tannenbaum, and the song, translated, the familiar Red Flag song of the British workers. The Kawasaki boy was a little mistaken in his choral geography, but his idea was right.

When the Middle Ages meet the twentieth century, the twentieth century wins.

The New World Court

By WILLIAM HARD

III. As Derailment of Americanism

IN this article I shall contend that our proposed entrance into the new Permanent Court of International Justice would derail the United States from its true proper special international mission in two ways. First, it would derail it into the European system of "sanctions"—of peace by force. Second, it would derail it from all possibility of ever establishing in its own regions of special authority and of special responsibility an international system on the basis clearly outlined by our forefathers—a system of peace by consent.

I begin by noting how continuously, how persistently, and (in the end) how vainly, a certain abiding element among us strives to thrust the United States into a dance under Europe's dazzling mirror! How odd, how perverse, how disgraceful, it seems now that in the era immediately succeeding the Napoleonic wars we had certain numerous American specialists in peace propaganda who sent congratulations to that throttler of European continental liberty, Alexander the First of Russia, organizer of that scheme of political diabolism, the Holy Alliance! Alexander was going to extinguish representative government on the European continent, by force; and then he was going to reduce armaments and have peace. So they overlooked his means and gazed at his asserted end and congratulated him. Throughout our history these Americans among us have always stood ready to applaud peace achieved by any methods whatsoever in Europe; and throughout our history they have not produced one important effort for achieving peace on an American basis in the Americas.

They call themselves cosmopolitans, internationalists; they really are unreclaimed provincials, colonials, unable to lift their eyes from their European metropolis.

Against them, in generation after generation, the voice of attempted arrived Americanism has been raised. Henry Clay raised it in Congress in 1820 when he exclaimed: "We look too much abroad. Let us break these fetters. Let us no longer watch the nods of European politicians. Let us become real and true Americans and place ourselves at the head of an American system."

These Americanizing efforts have been as vain among us as the efforts toward Europeanization. What we have witnessed, from our foundation till now, has been a deadlock between these two opposing forces. We do not go to Europe; and we do not accomplish our duty in the Americas and in the Orient.

Again we are in the midst of a surge toward Europe. We are told that we must join the new Permanent Court of International Justice in order to help mankind. What is meant, in fact, is European mankind.

The new Court has handled sixteen subjects. Thirteen of them have come from the continent of Europe. Two of them have come from Mediterranean possessions of European countries. The remaining one has come out of a dispute between the power which holds London and the power which holds Constantinople.

The work of this new Court, exactly like all the actual important political work of the whole of the League of Nations, is European. We deal here with institutions which call themselves world-wide and which indeed bear a certain illusory world-wide guise, but which in fact and in essence devote themselves merely and only in high politics to the settlement of European questions and to the inveigling of the rest of the world into the upbuilding of a new and universally dominant European community.

I congratulate them. They are doing more for themselves than we for ourselves are doing. They are doing more for their sort of peace than we are doing for our sort of peace. I felicitate them. We Americans are stunned by Locarno. Why? Before this big European Locarno there were little European Locarnos.

In 1922 Czecho-Slovakia and Austria agreed that they would settle all disputes between them—all—either by "amicable arrangement" or by judicial settlement. In 1923 Poland and Esthonia and Latvia and Finland agreed that they would settle all disputes between them—all—by "exclusively pacific methods," involving (if necessary) judicial settlement. Again in 1923 Austria and Hungary agreed that they would settle all disputes between them—all—either by diplomacy or by an arbitral body.

These little Locarnos came before the big Locarno and were part of the same stream of European tendency. Note that they all are "regional." Note that they all are groupings by peoples around a certain spot toward peace on that spot. Note that, as the spots accumulate, they begin to constitute a new integrated Europe. Note that thus Europe, without any official help whatsoever from us, is on its way toward a new mighty youth.

Strange, is it not, that the Continent which is the fountain of our civilization should be able to draw its refreshment from its own ancient resources without indebtedness to the American frontier cascade which flowed from it? Yes. Strange indeed it must have seemed to the college boys who next month were assembled out of so many American colleges to meet together and to demand our entrance into the new Permanent Court of International Justice on the ground that they must help the world and that Europe needs their brains!

Yet a disheartening thought, to which I have already alluded, immediately occurs. With all these splendid graduate and undergraduate brains of ours, which Europe is said so much to need, where are our American Locarnos?

Have we a Locarno with Mexico? Of course not. Have we a Locarno with Haiti or Santo Domingo or Nicaragua? Certainly not. In our passion for peace, have we forbidden war with any of the countries which so often hear the tread of our marines? Perish the thought! Do our American specialists in peace plans and in prizes for peace plans concentrate upon an American peace with our American victims? No! Absolutely and eternally no! If they did, they would cease to be the chief and most valuable screens and allies of our contemporary American imperialists. No, they give to contemporary American imperialism a passing glance and then they leave it in the shadow and concentrate upon bringing peace to Europeans who have signed treaties much more far-reaching toward peace (of their sort) than any treaties are that are even suggested for us to sign in our own areas of dominance and duty.

What do such people represent? They represent a well-known form of what our modern mental philosophers call something like "substitution." They represent what our medieval theological philosophers equally aptly called an attempt to escape from the consciousness of sin. Having failed to perform their duty where they are, they fly to perform it where they are not.

We are in the Orient. Even before we took the Philippines we were in the Orient. We were there with special duties, special rights. On February 28, 1844, under special orders from Secretary of State Daniel Webster, there arrived at Macao, off the southern coast of China, with two frigates and a sloop of war, Caleb Cushing of Massachusetts. He demanded, he secured, audience with the aloof and contemptuous dignitaries of China. He demanded, he secured, a treaty with China. With that treaty we began to be one of the concert of Powers in China and in the whole Far East. We cooperated with that concert in opening the Japanese Strait of Shimonoseki, by naval force, in 1863. We have cooperated with that concert continuously in matters of extraterritoriality and in matters of tariff in China. Through ancient wrongs in the Far East we have contemporary rights and responsibilities in the Far East. We have none in Europe. We are not a European Power. We were, we are, an Oriental Power.

Where then is our Oriental Locarno? There is a Four-Power Treaty between us and Britain and France and Japan. Under this treaty we agree to respect one another's possessions in the Pacific. We do not agree to respect one another. We must not attack Japan's loot, Formosa. We are free to attack Japan. Japan is free to attack us. Where is our Locarno outlawing war between us and Britain and France and Japan in the Oriental region? It is nowhere. It does not exist.

We are American enough not to go to Europe; and yet we are so provincial and so colonial that we do not seem to be able to bring our minds to bear upon doing anything fundamentally effective for peace outside Europe. That is our situation.

Our proposed entrance into the new World Court is the cunningest device that we have ever faced for making us finally, after all, into the little brother of Europe and for making us finally, after all, forget and forfeit our possible leadership and headship of an American System. It is the cunningest because, as I pointed out last week, it takes us into "sanctions" without our knowing that we are going into "sanctions." And when we once have gone into "sanctions," when we once have gone into a recognized organized system for the joint international coercion of sovereign states, we shall have ceased to be, in the sense of the American Constitutional Convention of 1787, Americans.

We have used force waywardly and even inexcusably many times in the course of our national history. We have more than once followed international coercion as a devil. We never yet have enshrined it as a god. It is the difference between falls into sin and the elevation of iniquity into righteousness.

The members of the American Constitutional Convention of 1787 considered fully the problem of "sanctions." The word was as familiar to them as it is to us. They were acquainted with all the phrases, all the ideas, of all political time. Lord Chatham said that our Continental Congress of 1775 had never been surpassed in the records of legislative bodies for "solidity of reasoning, force of sagacity, wisdom of conclusion." Our Constitutional Convention was superior even to that Congress. It explored "sanctions" through and through. James Madison, in his diary of the convention, early reports that "the more he reflected on the use of force, the more he doubted its practicability when applied to a people collectively." He then subsequently reports that "the practicability of making coercive sanctions against sovereign states has been exploded on all hands." The idea of "sanctions" was thereupon totally abandoned by the convention.

Naturally, no work by legislators can prevent two sections of a country from springing to arms against each other if they are determined to spring. That is not the point. The point is that not even against the States of this Union were our constitutional forefathers willing to give even to our own Supreme Court the right to enforce its mandates by "sanctions." That court has issued many decisions against States in this Union. There have been evasions, there have been delays, in the obeying of certain of those decisions. Never has there been any effort to compel obedience to those decisions by force.

What our forefathers rejected between our own States they would infinitely more emphatically have rejected as a means of peace between countries actually foreign and alien to one another. Our forefathers believed that a system of "sanctions," instead of being conducive to peace, would be cumulatively productive of eternal warfare.

But the Permanent Court of International Justice is the adviser of the League of Nations, and the League of Nations is the enforcer of the Court's decisions and of its own decisions by force of starvation, by force of blood, by "sanctions," by might of an attempted universal Tower of Babel concealing but aiding and abetting the rise of a new and greater force-ridden, force-bearing Europe.

So, in sum, I say that we Americans again have our choice.

If the Americas bore us; if the Orient bores us; if home fills us with tedium; if we detest laboring to protect the Nicaraguans against ourselves; if we yawn at the task of freeing China from its exploiters (including ourselves); if we feel that our true happiness must lie in protecting Austrians against Hungarians, or Hungarians against Austrians, who have already by treaty protected themselves; if we pine to play about in an area all sown with "sanctions"; if we want to watch them bursting in air and making life lively; if we want to absorb ourselves into a system philosophically irreconcilably hostile to our own original traditional system; if we want at last definitively to abandon our system and to be reannexed definitively to a scheme of things which has filled Europe with glory and Asia and Africa with tears—why, then, let us join this new Court!

If, on the other hand, we abide in the American distrust of "sanctions"; if we reproach ourselves for not having tried to build up in the Americas and in the Orient an American peace by consent without "sanctions"; if we wish to remain free to build up that sort of peace on that sort of foundation; if we do not wish to add to a long neglect of our duty a final sale of our birthright; if we are not willing to exchange the possibility of an American System for the certainty of the perpetual dominance of the European System; if we are not willing to become even the acclaimed and flattered savior of that European System; if we can still hear John Quincy Adams saying that our mingling into the European System would "change the fundamental maxims of the policy of America from liberty to force" and would bring it about that "the frontlet on her brow would no longer beam with the splendor of freedom, but in its stead there would be substituted an imperial diadem, flashing in false luster, the murky radiance of dominion and power"; and if we can still hear him saying that thus in a Europe of force "America might become the dictatress of the world, but would no longer be the ruler of her own spirit"—why, kill our entrance into this new Court!

A Reply to Mr. Hard

By WALTER LIPPMANN

UNTIL I read Mr. Hard's articles I did not know that he was prepared not only to oppose and denounce those who, like myself, favor America's joining the World Court but to explain our aberrations as well. He says we are attempting to escape from the consciousness of sin. He thinks we have sinned in the Americas against nations like the Mexicans and the Haitians, and that we are turning to Europe in an effort to forget our sins. He thinks that we want to protect "Austrians against Hungarians or Hungarians against Austrians" because we do not want to think about protecting Haitians against Americans.

Mr. Hard may know better than I know it myself why I favor the World Court; so in the face of his beautiful certainty I must not speak dogmatically. I think I am for the World Court because I think it may help to maintain peace somewhat. I may be mistaken both as to what the World Court will do and as to why I think what I think about it. But if I am going to have a diagnosis made upon me, I would like somebody to do it who is not suffering, as Mr. Hard is suffering, from extreme absent-mindedness.

Mr. Hard has just written three articles arguing that Europe can take care of itself without our assistance, and that we ought to confine our activities to the Americas and to the Orient. For these are "our own areas of dominance and duty," whereas Europe and the affairs of Europe are no practical concern of ours. When I read this I wondered whether Mr. Hard had ever heard of the war which we entered in 1917. It is almost certain that Mr. Hard knew about that war at the time, but somehow he failed to mention it in any of his three articles devoted to outlining the foreign policy and describing the destiny of these United States.

I cannot regard as serious a theory of foreign policy which fails to take account of such an enormous fact as the participation of two million Americans in a war on European soil. For while it is excellent to talk about our dominance and duty and our sins in the Americas, neither our dominance nor our duty nor our sins in the Caribbean ever drew us into such a frightful mess as did somebody else's sins in the Balkans. Mr. Hard speaks with feeling about "our nineteen dead marines at Vera Cruz"; he says nothing about our fifty thousand dead soldiers in France. So, if in advocating the World Court I am trying to forget Vera Cruz, what, I should like to know, is Mr. Hard trying to forget when he forgets the Argonne?

A theory of American foreign policy formulated in the year 1925 which does not consider the fact that rightly or wrongly, for good or for evil, we were drawn into the European war is not a very deeply considered theory. The area of our "dominance and duty" may be in the Americas and the Orient, but it was a war originating in Europe which really made a difference in our lives. I do not mean to underrate the importance of reforming our policy toward Latin America, but in their effect on American life, on American interests, on the whole course of our civilization, how is it possible to compare the effects of our interventions in Latin America with the effects of our intervention in Europe? However, Mr. Hard does not compare them. He just omits all reference to our intervention in Europe.

A theory of American foreign policy which is as one-sided as that is will not help a man to consider the World Court fairly. Mr. Hard, I say flatly, does not write fairly about the Court. I charge him with prejudice. For example: "The new Court has handled sixteen subjects. On only four of them has it made decisions of its own. On all the rest of them it has been the mere attorney of the League." That implies that the Court is to the League what a lawyer is to his client. That is wholly untrue. The judges of the Court are entirely independent of the League. They cannot be removed by the League. Their Court cannot be abolished by the League. The statute under which they operate cannot be changed by the League. They are nominated not by the League but by the national groups in the old Hague Court. After the nominations are made, the Powers of the League plus certain others elect them. If we sign the protocol we shall take part in the election without any obligation under the Covenant of the League. The pay of the judges was fixed by the Assembly, but it cannot be decreased during the period of their appointment. A judge serves for nine years. He cannot be removed except by the unanimous opinion of all the judges and deputy-judges.

I submit that these men are not in a relation to the League like that of an attorney to his client. I submit further that a fair examination of the whole question of advisory opinions will convince anyone that Mr. Hard misunderstands the word "advisory." It is true the word sounds as if the League could go to the Court and say: "Tell us how to do this or that. Tell us how to give an appearance of legality to our policy." But that is not what the advisory opinions actually are. They are opinions delivered publicly after a public hearing on a point of law and they differ from the ordinary opinion of a court only in that the proceedings are not started by the parties at interest. The League may ask the Court for an opinion as to its powers under the Covenant or the League may ask the Court to decide a legal question which arises in the course of a dispute that is before the League. In any case the Court is probably free to refuse to give an opinion; it is certainly free to give the opinion the judges think right; and there is no power in the League as such which can coerce the opinion. The judges, of course, may be subject to the pressure of influences, but that weakness would exist in any court anywhere, and has nothing whatever to do with the League or with advisory opinions.

I am not sure I think the advisory opinion is a good thing. Yet the State of Massachusetts has used the device for a long time. But whether it is good or bad I am sure of one thing: No man trying to state the matter fairly would say that when the Supreme Court of Massachusetts renders an advisory opinion it is the mere attorney of the party in power. Yet that is what Mr. Hard would like his readers to think about the World Court.

He would also like them to think that by signing the protocol we shall become bound to back up the decisions of the Court by force of arms. No such obligation exists in law, but he thinks we should be in honor bound. I think this is a romantic view of the matter.

If we went to war against what is called a covenant-breaking state, it would not be because we belonged to the World Court but because we belonged to the world. We should be drawn in, no matter whether we had commitments or not, just as we were drawn in when we had no commitments in 1917, because in an era when commerce is world-wide neutrality is impossible in a great war. For modern war involves the blockade, and you have either got to assist the blockade or break it. You cannot be neutral in the face of a blockade. The United States especially cannot be neutral, for it is so great a source of munitions of war that the whole success of the blockade would depend upon the policy of the United States. If we allowed the blockade to be established we should strike a fatal blow against the blockaded Power; and if we ran the blockade we should ruin the blockading Power.

For that reason we shall always be involved in any war that is not merely a local war. Our entrance into the Court or even the League will not add to, or take away from, our entanglement in the affairs of the world. To my mind, therefore, the risks of association with Europe in time of peace are negligible since we are bound to be associated anyway in time of war. It seems to me sensible, therefore, to use our power in time of peace to give prestige to any agency which is designed to increase the facilities for peaceable adjustment. Since we cannot escape a great war if it comes, we do not add to our peril, and we may lessen it if we support institutions like the Court, which are intended to make war less likely.

WHEN the Drifter heard the other day that the ice was eight inches thick in the middle of a certain lake in northwestern Connecticut and fourteen inches thick around the edges, he was minded to take the next train for the north. The ice, of course, has often been as thick as that; but thick ice and no snow to speak of make a combination rare enough to be sought after. Skating, for those who enjoy it, is then at its best; fishing through a hole chopped with a hatchet offers a fine morning's entertainment; and if these less strenuous diversions become tiresome, the visitor can always stand around on one foot and offer advice and an occasional shoulder while ice for next summer is being cut. Around the rim of the lake the Drifter can picture the winter woods, bare except for the pines and hemlocks, yet colored with the peculiar purplish light that lies on them from November on. If there are animals abroad—and most of them are sound asleep or gone elsewhere—they scurry over dried leaves and yellowed ferns and pick up a precarious living from partridge berries and the like. The laurel is still green and bright; a few burning brown leaves cling to the oak branches. It is, taken all in all, a most engaging time of year, less often celebrated, less spectacular, but fully as alluring as the more famous spring or ardent fall.

* * * * *

THE Drifter remembers vividly a description of W. H. Hudson's of winter near the Land's End. Outdoors it is damp and cold; inside the small stone houses, with walls two feet thick, fires of dried furze strive with the winter temperature and the rain. The room is lighted only by an inadequate lamp; the great stone fire-place yawns darkly; a heap of furze is thrown on the hearth and in a few seconds the room is a blaze of light and the heat unbearable. But only for a moment; presently it is as dark and cold as before, and until another burning bush is thrown down, the inhabitants shiver and drip. How different is the scene indoors near the Drifter's Connecticut lake. There the fireplaces have been closed off except in one room; stoves glow redly, the rooms are pleasantly dry and snug, and in the one chimney left open logs a foot through burn and are replenished all day. There are apples in the cellar and hickory nuts in a bag hung from the rafters in the woodshed. There is even a fender to hold lazy feet and a glass of something hot and fiery. If the frozen lake is alluring, how much more so this heat and drowsy comfort and pleasant inactivity! It is not even necessary to think of cutting wood, for this was done last November by an industrious and insistent buzz-saw.

* * * * *

IT is deplorable to think that millions of persons live through entire winters in New York without ever experiencing any of these things. For them the fireplace is the steam radiator, the lake an indoor skating rink, the glass of something hot a synthetic concoction with ice in it. Surely the human race can sink no lower. The Drifter pities those specimens of it; if he were actually by his fireside in Connecticut—or, more accurately, the fireside of an accommodating friend—he could pity them even more. As it is, he is doomed for the present to a steam radiator, but in memory he has known Eden. He can look out the window and see blown apple branches instead of radio apparatus, dried cornstalks in place of flying bits of newspaper, stiff grass and not uneven asphalt. The roar of the wind from the valley is in his ears instead of crashing motor trucks; his fellow-men are few and far between, beating their way along a sheltered ridge or down a rutty, frozen road. And instead of the almost imperceptible change in the city from winter to mid-winter, and then to late winter and early spring, he can imagine the delights of sugaring off, the first rush of water underneath the ice, the ice breaking up, and the tremendous advent of a crocus leaf.

Correspondence

Mr. Lewisohn's "Israel"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To students of race and racial characteristics no book published in the past year equals in interest Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn's "Israel." The problem of the Jewish race in its relation to the rest of the community is there presented with understanding and sympathy. That this problem exists cannot now be denied. And it has sprung up in this country in the last fifty years. The race problem is not a new one over here. Seventy-five years ago an equivalent prejudice, though founded on different grounds, existed against the Irish in this country. "No Irish need apply" was a frequent insertion in advertisements here. Let the Jewish race give up claiming that they are "hundred per cent American." Let them be satisfied with being seventy-five per cent American and twenty-five per cent Hebrew. All the rest of us acknowledge and take some pride in our racial ancestry. The Jew can well and proudly claim that his race is the only pure race, the only race that has preserved for three thousand years its physical and mental characteristics; that the rest of the Americans are hybrids composed of a mixture of strains—Saxon, Teutonic, Slavic, Celtic, Latin, etc.—and that this very purity of racial strain gives the Jew a cause for pride. With this in mind the Jews should found, support, and patronize their own universities, hospitals, and other institutions of aid and culture, take a pride in their race and heritage and not try to deny them or force themselves into the society of Gentiles. And let the Gentiles, on the other hand, remember that Christ was born of the Jewish race and bear themselves toward the Jewish race accordingly.

Opponents of Militarism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Please permit me to correct a slight inaccuracy in one of this week's [December 23] editorial paragraphs of The Nation. You mention Morris R. Cohen as the only professor of the College of the City of New York courageous enough to take a public stand against compulsory military science at the institution. This does a grave injustice to several other members of the faculty who were as outspoken and as vigorous if not as prompt in their criticism as was Professor Cohen. Particularly to be commended is Professor William B. Otis, one of the directors of the National Security League! Not only did he speak in behalf of the students' cause at his weekly forum in Public School No. 111, but he addressed a student rally at the college as well, and together with Professor Breithut of the chemistry department led the fight of the subsequent faculty meeting.

A STUDENT

Getting a Hearing

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With interest and some dismay I read not long ago in The Nation a statement which I hope may be symbolically rather than actually true. The statement, contained in an editorial headed An American Paradox [November 11], was to the effect that "Literary interest and literary talent are extraordinarily diffused in America. Nearly everybody can read, nearly everybody can write, and, as a result, almost anyone with anything to say is sure of a hearing."

I will not be personal. That it has become almost as much of a problem to dispose of rejection slips as it has to rid the house of disused razor blades is a fact whose explanation the discerning mind will readily derive from the above-quoted statement. But there are yet to be accounted for two other classes of literary people from whose ranks I am eliminated. These are the perhaps few, perhaps many, who also receive rejection slips but who do have something to say nevertheless, and that menacingly large class of real 24-karat authors who are perpetually featured in our magazines but who long since have ceased to have anything to say. Thus it is that the covers of magazines contain a good deal of high-power ammunition which is never fired off inside.

And of that first class of writers, what? The very Titans of literature themselves are proud of the fact that for ten years they never succeeded in publishing a thing. And yet one must suppose that in that early day they had something to say, though it is gone from them now.

To be "sure of a hearing" is, I am afraid (and trust), a privilege not immediately accorded to owners of ideas, valuable or otherwise. No, Mr. Editor, you haven't given us the whole story. A link of logic is missing. Some day, when you have time and a column to fill, won't you amend that statement of yours to read: "Almost anyone with anything to say is sure of a hearing, if somebody will lift him up on his shoulders where he can be seen—and heard."

DAVID O. WOODBURY

More About Bishop Brown

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Rowland F. Nye, in your issue of December 9, voices a common misunderstanding concerning the case of Bishop William Montgomery Brown when he criticizes The Nation for noting editorially what actually happened in New Orleans.

In the first place, a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church was "deposed" and the tradition that Episcopal orders are indelible was thus sacrificed. In the second place, contrary to the traditions of the church, a man who subscribed in full to all the statements of the creeds, and whose honesty in the matter was never even questioned, was nevertheless held guilty because he did not interpret those dogmas as his judges wished them interpreted. But again, contrary to all the traditions, his judges refused to state how they wished them interpreted, but fell back, exactly as you stated, "on the sacred fourth-century words of the liturgies as 'doctrine' to which a bishop must subscribe."

If Mr. Nye had read the opinion of the Review Court, whose findings were ratified by the House of Bishops, he would not have to ask what those words were; for if the Nicene Creed is not a fourth-century wording of Christian faith, what is it? That it is a "doctrine" of the church, however, was disputed by Bishop Brown, on the ground that the Prayer Book itself does not make such a claim but presents the creeds rather as liturgies, while distinctly referring to the Holy Scriptures as the sole standard of Episcopal doctrine.

But the big point in Bishop Brown's case is not that he was unfairly treated. It is, as you intimated, that the church could not find him guilty without sacrificing not only its traditions but its common sense. For Bishop Brown, from the first, admitted the right of the church to hold its bishops to any standard of doctrine which the church saw fit to impose; and agreed to plead guilty, and resign without a trial, if his judges would declare their own literal belief in the dogmas which he was accused of controverting.

Bishop Brown, to be sure, does not look upon the church as a political party, held together by an agreement to stand by certain defined doctrines. He looks at it, rather, as a family; and if one member of a family disagrees with the others on some point of doctrine, it is not considered incumbent upon him to resign from the family. But if an agreement upon doctrine is required, common sense would seem to demand that something be stated upon which to agree; and Bishop Brown's great contribution to modern thought has been his demonstration that no such doctrinal standard can be raised today.

He admitted from the start that he did not believe the creeds literally and that he doubtless did not believe them as they were originally intended to be believed. The people who formulated them believed that the earth was flat and that heaven was upstairs and hell down below; and that they intended that others should believe exactly this is evident from the way they treated unbelievers as soon as they were strong enough to gain jurisdiction over them.

Bishop Brown, however, while freely admitting his guilt, if the creeds must be interpreted as they were originally intended, pointed out that the application of the old standard would find everybody else guilty as well. But if he were allowed to interpret them symbolically, he asked that some standard of symbolic interpretation be employed. The answer of the church, after the Review Court had pondered this problem for eight months, was to ignore the whole question and fall back (as Bishop Brown warned them that they would have to) upon those old fourth-century wordings which no modern churchman can possibly accept, unless he, just like the bishop, reads modern meanings into them.

There is no question, to be sure, that Bishop Brown's views are very different from the views of any other bishop and of the vast majority of the other spokesmen of the church. But the fact remains that they can not try him for this divergence without committing the church, as it was committed in New Orleans, to a standard which nobody can accept.

"You do not agree with us," the church very properly told him.

"Correct," said the bishop. "What of it?"

"We shall put you out," they said.

"For what?" he asked.

"For not believing as we do," they said.

"What do you believe?" he inquired.

"The Creeds," he was told.

"So do I," he said.

"But not in the way we do," they explained.

"In what way do you believe them?" he asked.

"In the right way, of course," was the answer, "but we won't go into that. Here are the words of the Creeds and here are your words. To be sure, each of us interprets the words differently, and nobody can interpret them today as the fourth-century formulators did; but here is their formula, here are your words; it is easy to see that they do not tally."

It was not very nice of The Nation to make any comment upon such purely ecclesiastical proceedings, but the comment which it did make was in exact accordance with the facts. The only excuse for making it is that the Bishop Brown case marks an epoch in American thinking which has hitherto been greatly clouded by the assumption that the church does "teach" certain things. The church does not teach. It learns. It learns slowly, but it learns.

A Word on Musical Criticism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Haggin's exposition of jazz in The Nation of December 9 is something for which musician and layman alike should be very grateful.

Such devastating penetration as Mr. Haggin's is an example of what musical criticism should really possess. It is obvious that the author of it derives his clarity from a mind and aesthetic comparatively removed from the necessity of daily utterance, and correspondingly capable of arriving at more useful and discerning conclusions than characterize current musical criticism.

Speed Control for Automobiles

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. John H. Bartlett, the First Assistant Postmaster General at Washington, in courteous reply to my letter of inquiry, writes me, under date of December 17, that "All government-owned mail trucks are equipped with devices which make it impossible to operate them in excess of a certain speed."

The point I wish to make is this—that what has been done, and done successfully, by the federal government for the reduction of automobile accidents and fatalities could be done successfully by the various State governments; and that the government of the State of New York could, and should, pass a law making it compulsory that all the automobiles in the State, whether privately owned or otherwise, should be "equipped with devices to make it impossible to operate them in excess of a certain speed" (a speed consistent with public safety.)

BERTRAND SHADWELL

He Wears a Hat

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: What, may I ask, has become of those most worthy of crusaders who last spring so loudly demanded a "hatless Manhattan"?

Have they, with heads exposed to the blazing rays of an August sun, like the stricken horse, passed on to their reward or has the withering frost of early November driven them into hibernation where they await the vernal call of another season?

A good, comfortable hat is one of God's finest gifts to humanity. I am not a hat-maker. I plow corn for a livelihood, and sure realize the value of a good hat.

Pueblo Legend

By LILIAN WHITE SPENCER

The ancient tribes, when they and earth were new,
Dwelt on lush emerald fields, set in a frame
Of silver streams, and hunted willing game;
Fat with unending feasts: for Awanyu,
Plumed serpent-god of water sources, threw
His rivers down to them . . . till they became Indifferent and ceased to bless his name.
Then, to the deeps of heaven he withdrew.

Long must dry lips of thirsty deserts pray
Before the rain's cool cup is theirs to take.
Still, Awanyu, who is the Milky Way,
Unpardoning, swims down his dark sky lake.
Did padres know, who at San Felipe
Carved round a font the image of a snake?

First Glance

THOMAS HARDY is perhaps the only poet today who could and would fill 279 pages with poems most of which are bad and all of which are interesting. He has done this in "Human Shows, Far Phantasies, Songs, and Trifles" (Macmillan: $2.25), a volume which at eighty-five reveals Mr. Hardy in all the baldness of his worst technique and yet is continuously readable. I could name several dozen pieces here and defy anyone to match them in all reputable English verse for grittiness and crabbed cacophony. But some of these very pieces I should also have to place among those English poems which I most respect; they, with others in this volume, have become new evidence supporting my old conviction that Mr. Hardy is far and away the most considerable of living British poets. I am not saying, either, that I like these poems in spite of their faults. I have grown to like even Mr. Hardy's faults, and suspect indeed that they are but aspects of some deep central virtue which deserves a better definition than it has ever got. In the case of this poet, as in the case of every other good poet whom I know, the thing seen is quite inseparable from the thing said; to rearrange his words would be to destroy the world which they have so patiently built.

The temptation is strong to find "Human Shows" expressing the old age of its author. One could seem to make a case by beginning on the first page with the little dialogue in which the poet and a star discover that they both are merely waiting until some change shall come. One might go on then to several pieces in which Mr. Hardy represents himself as walking like a ghost of old days among new dancers and new lovers who do not know him. And there would seem to be significance in numerous poems dealing concretely with death—in the address, for instance, to six boards which one day will have much in common with him who speaks to them, or in the remarkable lyric called When Dead:

It will be much better when
I am under the bough;
I shall be more myself, Dear, then,
Than I am now.

No sign of querulousness

To wear you out

Shall I show there: strivings and stress

Be quite without.

This fleeting life-brief blight

Will have gone past

When I resume my old and right

Place in the Vast.

But it must be remembered that Mr. Hardy has always been old and that he has always written poems. A few poems here are dated back as far as fifty years; others hail from their author's prime; and of the dozens which are undated I am sure it would be unsafe to talk in terms of internal evidence. I prefer on the whole to take "Human Shows" simply as one more collection of dramatic lyrics by a poet whose pleasure it has been to create within himself an infinite variety of human moods and to give them the most concise and gleaming form possible to his pen. The next book by Mr. Hardy cannot be older than this one, nor has any previous book been younger. His consistency has been quite as great as his variety.

MARK VAN DOREN

A Tower and a Light

Cornish Granite. Extracts from the Writings and Speeches of Lord Courtney of Penwith. Compiled by Esme C. M. Stewart and E. Satterthwaite, with an introduction by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch. London: Leonard Parsons. 6/.

LORD COURTNEY was a Cornishman of principles truly as strong and unshakable as granite—a type of statesman, it often seems to us, which England alone can produce, albeit in far too small numbers. He was distinctly of the material of which Bright and Cobden were made, and in his devotion to peace and international good-will, his never-failing championship of free trade, his thirst for justice, and his opposition to imperialism he walked in their footsteps. Like John Stuart Mill he was called "the conscience of the House of Commons," and like John Morley he could sacrifice high office for conscience' sake. As Morley left the Cabinet when the World War came, so Courtney resigned as Secretary to the Treasury in protest against the non-inclusion of proportional representation in the Gladstone Reform Bill of 1884—as he had also deprived himself of a Cabinet seat by refusing to go along with Mr. Gladstone on the Home Rule issue. Finally he gave up his seat in Parliament in 1900 because of his opposition to his country and its government during the Boer War. The World War fulfilled several longstanding predictions of his—that the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine by Germany in 1871 was a dreadful mistake and that the armament race of the nations could have only one ending. During it he spoke out bravely for an early and just peace, refused to hate and vilify the enemy, and pleaded the cause of the conscientious objector although he himself was not opposed to all war. As he was then in his eighties, and totally blind, he could make no other protests; he was the exact type of Englishman who should have made the peace at Versailles.

Curiously enough this internationally minded Liberal was for fourteen years a member of the staff of the London Times; a leader-writer of distinction under the famous Delane and at the same time a member of the Radical Club and the Political Economy Club. Yet he could not compromise his principles, and he was happy to graduate to a political life in which he could at all times stand for the things he believed in without thought of cost or consequences. "My maxim of international conduct," he wrote, "is to make friends of all and allies of none." Like George Washington he was for "no entangling alliances" for his country, and he particularly warned his countrymen against the type of international pledge which took England, to her utter misfortune, into the World War. Especially severe was this graduate of the imperialistic Times upon the theory that the great countries must go to war all over the globe "to prevent anarchy"; because "when we go to prevent anarchy we create anarchy, and having created anarchy we are obliged to keep a firm hold upon it, because we cannot withdraw without a danger of something worse than existed before."

Lord Courtney was a passionate lover of poetry; his extraordinary memory retained poem after poem of great length and difficulty. Yet the extracts from his speeches in the little volume before us are unvaried by quotation and lacking in grace and charm. They are truly as forthright as the towering cliffs of his Cornwall. Simple, straightforward, and earnest these addresses are; sincerity and honesty shine through every page. They are admirable political texts—we wish they might be in the hands of every student of political science and international relations. It is a pity, however, that nothing appears from his speeches against the Boer War; and the book suffers greatly as a volume of reference because the extracts are printed with no regard to the period or place or circumstance of their delivery. Not a single source is given. Yet, fragments as they are, they justify Quiller-Couch in speaking of Lord Courtney as he did years ago as being portrayed by two texts: "Lord, make men as towers!" and "All towers carry lights." America needs nothing so much in her political life today as men of conscience like Lord Courtney—towers carrying lights.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Increase and Multiply

The Biology of Population Growth. By Raymond Pearl. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

PROFESSOR PEARL'S book affords the best evidence I know of that biology still provides infinite material for new and original studies; that such studies may have tremendous human interest and importance; that experimentation and statistics are not only compatible but so mutually dependent that each seems almost impotent without the other; and that the reports of such scientific work can and should be not only comprehensible but beautifully written and highly entertaining to the intelligent general reader. This book illustrates further the fact that science, studied for its own sake, can be enthusiastically set forth by one who is non-Messianic, cold to the appeal of the Higher Good, and a stranger to the Uplift.

What is the book about and what do we learn from it? In the first place it details statistics (for the most part in appendices) and controlled experiments bearing on the question: What principles underlie the increase in biologic populations—from yeast to man? Then it presents ingratiating and closely reasoned argument about some of the factors which determine the observed results. The main conclusion of the study is that population growth follows a single law (in a given cultural epoch), which may be represented by a curve shaped like an S with its upper end drawn out to the right, and which the author puts in words as follows:

Growth occurs in cycles. Within one and the same cycle, and in a spatially limited area or universe, growth in the first half of the cycle starts slowly, but the absolute increment per unit of time increases steadily until the midpoint of the cycle is reached. After that point the increment per unit of time becomes steadily smaller until the end of the cycle.

The universality of this principle is attested by the similarity in equations and curves obtained by studying the growth of the rat, the pumpkin, the yeast plant, the tadpole's tail, and the population growth of Sweden, France, Germany, Algeria, and fruit-flies (Drosophila). Here we have, as the author says, means "to predict, upon a more adequate scientific basis than mere guesswork, future populations, or to estimate past populations, outside the range of known census counts." In making this statement he is careful to emphasize the limitation of prophecy to a single cultural epoch, modestly claiming high accuracy "for the next ten or twenty years."

The reader will be surprised to find three chapters devoted to Algeria, but the reason is plain and sufficient. It is because this country is a case which comes close to supplying in full desiderata which are rare in this field, viz., "adequate records and clean-cut racial and social discontinuities on a scale of respectable statistical magnitude." This study of the numbers, the mortality and birth-rates, the hygiene, and the sexual habits of the Algerians proves conclusively that the logistic curve approximates a real law; but beyond this it suggests inquiries—regarding the influence of density, of economic and social factors, of sex activity, etc.—which occupy the rest of the book and look outward toward limitless regions of future research.

In his discussion of the differential birth-rate in civilized countries Professor Pearl finds that powerful factors cause the poor to multiply while the rich do not, one of them being the unique availability for the socially unfortunate of bodily pleasures and the much wider choice of amusements open to the well-to-do. He concludes on such grounds that the efforts of the eugenicists to correct the situation by persuading the "socially, economically, and in some part biologically superior classes to reproduce more freely as a sort of transcendental social duty" are not likely to meet with any notable success. The alternative—birth control for the poor—seems to Pearl to be more promising. His experience has led him to the opinion that after proper legal and educational changes are made those with a high birth-rate may possibly see the light. This is as near to propaganda for social betterment as our author gets.

The section innocently entitled Human Behavior and the Birth-Rate is in reality a unique and unexpected contribution to scientific knowledge. In it will be found records of the sexual activity of 257 men averaging about 65 years of age, records which Pearl considers sufficiently reliable from every point of view. The analysis of this body of data brings out many points of interest immediately connected with the subject of the book, such as the relation of sexual prowess to fertility, as well as other items for which the reader must turn to the book itself.

Professor Pearl is the antithesis of the popular figure of the great scientist. He is intensely interested in music, prints, old editions of Lucretius, what is good to eat and drink—as absorbed in these spiritual things of this world, if the phrase be permitted, as he is in his scientific studies. Or so it seems to his observing friends. He is thus a lively witness to the truth of the principle that overspecialization, exclusive withdrawal from the world, is not necessary to learned achievement. And what is perhaps more important, his book with its wide appeal to the intelligent, non-scientific public would have been quite impossible apart from its author's wide human interests.

Spiced Pastry

Letters to a Lady in the Country, Together with Her Replies.

By Paul and Caroline, with an introduction by Stuart Sherman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

THESE letters, ostensibly written by a young Kentuckian in New York to a lady who has married a Landsmann of his, appeared originally in the columns of Books, of which Mr. Sherman is the editor; and they now reappear with his editorial blessing. Some of the lady's replies are included in this formal collection, as well as a few epistles by her relatively unliterary husband. One misses two or three of her earlier printed responses, which were, as I recall them, somewhat more pithy and less "purple" than her subsequent letters. One misses, to a far greater degree, a conclusion to the tale that is unfolded in these mildly romantic and as mildly intellectual conversations on paper. It looks very much as though the gentleman concealed behind the anonymity of "Paul" and the lady hiding her pretty face in the skirts of "Caroline," being unable to work out a satisfactory solution for the problem in which they are the acute angles, left it blithely to the Euclidean-minded reader and so made an end.

Indeed the charm, as well as the fault, of this rather bland volume is that practically every question touched upon—and they are various—is left, ultimately, in the hands of the reader. There is, first of all, this business of the destinies of Paul, Caroline, and the husband of Caroline, who is, by the way, the friend of Paul. The situation presented is not new. Especially since Caroline is represented as a lovely, lovable, and witty woman, Paul as a charming and cultivated young man, and Jim—the husband in the case—as an attractive but rather blunt, naive fellow who makes the usual move of the jealous mate—that of bringing as close as possible the beloved and the new lover. But the result of this juxtaposition is not revealed. Neither is a decision reached with regard to the problem with which the letters commence: the importance, to an author, of what a French writer calls "the little fatherland," and Paul, "our American provinces." Nor does one come away sure of the meaning and use of what Paul, again, calls "personal culture." There is a certain amount of to-do about all these things, and a pleasant mental stir in consequence, but the tone of the correspondence is so light that to read it is like eating a pleasantly spiced pastry. It would, however, be churlish to quarrel with a dessert because it was not substantial, and it is equally ungracious to dismiss a provocative and intelligent book because it is neither intense nor profound.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

The Novel of Manners

Possession. By Louis Bromfield. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

FOR the moment the American novel of manners is, with one or two notable exceptions, in negligible if prosperous hands, while the few writers of pronounced talent follow the flickerings of the individual soul through the mazes of a labyrinth that might as well be in China as in America. There are of course always two legitimate general forms of the novel. The one concerns itself with the individual seen against his social background, and the other sees him suspended, as he also is, in abstract time and space—a Tom Jones and a Werther. Both of these are legitimate, but the boundaries of the imagination are artificially narrowed when the author confuses that placeless labyrinth which exists only in his own mind with the external and infinitely more varied world.

So just at this time it is particularly fortunate that Mr. Bromfield should have evoked for us Grandpa Tolliver and Julia Shane, Skinfint Seaton, little Miss Ogilvie, and Clarence Murdock—should in a word have seen that American life, rather like life elsewhere, cannot be summed up in a few generalizations or wholly forced into the Procrustean bed of the revulsions of any one writer or group of writers. For revulsions have a curious way of distorting reality; and the revulsion of one generation of writers against the superficialities, or misconceptions, or commercialized misrepresentations of the preceding generation often has the effect of equally distorting the newer vision. Because the general run of story-tellers up to the last dozen years had expressed their sense of the variety of life by presenting theatrical and sentimentalized versions of stock characters, many of the most gifted writers of the day deny the variety of life and paint for us only endless and rather one-sided self-portraits. And because many of our social customs are anachronisms or are hypocritical, they deny the complexity of the social milieu and see life stripped to a few basic passions; with the result that the foreigner wishing to gain from their work a notion of American life paints the ridiculous mental picture which Virginia Woolf exposed in a recent essay, and the relatively unimaginative average man whose sense of life must always in the main be drawn from more powerful imaginations comes to conceive it as curiously crude and dull.

The variety of the passing scene which Mr. Bromfield has craftily managed to snare for us—in short, Mr. Bromfield's reminder that the basic passions express themselves here, as elsewhere, in infinitely varied and interesting forms—is important. Nor does this importance seem to me to be invalidated by the fact that the novel does not come off; that in the end one must confess that the characters are only evoked, not created; that though the author is able to bring them on to the stage he cannot set them in motion; that he takes a pleasure in scenes like the royal accouchement of Ellen which leads him into a rather easy titillation of our nerves.

His imagination seems to work surely only in the smoky town where Shane Castle stands in the midst of mills. When he leaves it for the Arabian Nights magnificence and confusion of cosmopolitan success he gives us the stock characters of popular fiction, thereby possibly also giving aid and comfort to those more conscientious writers who scorn to falsify their sense of life even though it is rather dully symbolized in its more ecstatic moments by a man and a woman on a sawdust heap with a bottle of whiskey.

It is disappointing that this second novel by Mr. Bromfield shows no improvement over the promising first one, that it as consistently fails in the concrete working out of a really fine design, and that the writer, who has a definite talent for easy-flowing rhythmical prose, should still be as little disturbed about exactitude or poignancy of word or phrase. Though it must be remembered that the word fail can here have only a relative meaning, and that in doing Mr. Bromfield the high compliment of comparing his book with enduring work I do not forget that his failure betters most of the current output. Either Mr. Bromfield, whose native talents as a social historian are unusually rich, or someone else will eventually work the field which is here only zestfully surveyed and staked out.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Bits About Napoleon

The First Napoleon. Some Unpublished Documents from the Bowood Papers. By the Earl of Kerry. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THIS handsome volume has all the outward appearances of a book. It has a definite title and bears a respected author's name. But a book it is not; only a bundle of documents, ranging in date from 1797 to 1864, by miscellaneous authors on miscellaneous subjects. The one clear connection between them is that they found a resting-place in the capacious archives of Bowood Castle. There comes a time in the life of every student when he loses patience with all epic or dramatic narratives and with all hypotheses, opinions, and reflections, not excluding his own. In such a mood one fresh document will seem a pearl of great price, and this book promises us "unpublished documents." The reader's curiosity will not be completely unrewarded; but the reward could hardly be called munificent.

Among the documents is a letter from Napoleon to Flahault, dated Troyes, February 27, 1814, which "shows that the Emperor, under cover of his negotiations, was deliberately trying to deceive the enemy and to steal a march upon them."

This will cause no thrill of surprise and no shudder of indignation in any student of diplomacy, ancient or modern. We wonder whether any one between Saint Louis and President Wilson has ever played the armistice game without cards up his sleeves. The letter was omitted from the edition of Napoleon's correspondence published under the Second Empire by a commission of which Flahault was long a member. The very fact of the omission is in itself a document, but again a document which proves something that no one ever questioned, viz., the unreliable character of that monumental collection. The "Correspondence," evidently, was ruthlessly edited. At first it was not sifted quite carefully enough to please a thoroughgoing Napoleonist like Flahault. He maintained that the commission, "composed of intelligent men devoted to the imperial idea," should not "allow the printing of documents which were never intended for publication," but only of "such as might serve, if it were possible, to enhance the renown" of the Great Man; "in other words, documents which he, if he could have been consulted in person, would have himself published." In such wise are the sources of history medicated for several generations, until legends, like our own infant industries, are fully able to take care of themselves.

The person here in whom we can feel the keenest interest is Mme de Souza, Flahault's mother—a most devoted mother indeed. The way in which she used the wiles of the Ancient Regime under new and difficult circumstances is simply marvelous. A returned emigrée, the friend of Josephine, she captivated young Louis Bonaparte with her mature social charm. She managed to secure for her son a place in Louis's regiment, and instructed the youth to be "aux petits soins" with his influential colonel. So Charles became a lieutenant at the age of sixteen. The Consular Regime was keeping its promise: a career open to all the talents! When Flahault became the lover of Hortense, Mme de Souza was their go-between. And it was Hortense, a much greater favorite with Napoleon than his own morose brother, who paved "the way to promotion and pay" for the handsome young officer. As soon as Napoleon abdicated in 1814 Mme de Souza arranged for his submission to the Bourbons, and had him presented to the princes. After the Hundred Days she decided that an English heiress would be just the thing for him; and such was her genius for matchmaking that two years after Waterloo (June 19, 1817) her Charles married Miss Margaret Elphinstone, daughter of old Admiral Keith, who was none too well pleased with an aide-de-camp of Bony as his son-in-law. We are led to surmise that they lived happy ever after.

The strangest thing of all is that although young Flahault was not ignorant of his mother's scheming we do not find him despicable. He must have inherited the charm which was felt by such dissimilar characters as Talleyrand, Louis Bonaparte, and M. de Souza. He was personally brave and chivalrous; he was sincerely devoted to Hortense; and he idolized Napoleon, whom he served well. He lived to a ripe old age, covered with dignities by Louis-Philippe and by his "stepson" Napoleon III; he survived his brilliant offspring Morny by five years; and he died, lucky to the last, on the very eve of Sedan.

Books in Brief

The Relic. By Eca de Queiroz. Translated from the Portuguese by A. F. G. Bell. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

This novel is beautiful and damned; pious and blasphemous; romantic and realistic. It tells of priest-ridden life in Portugal and of a pilgrimage to the Holy Land made by a rake who, by pious conduct in the presence of his aunt, is seeking to win her fortune. The high point of imaginative power is the amazing description, presented as a dream, of the trial, crucifixion, and resurrection of Jesus Christ; the high point of passion is the Alexandrian episode; and the high point of cruel comedy, the uncovering of the "relic" brought back from the Holy Land. "The Relic" is not a novel for pietists, moralists, or the unhumorous. For all others it will be a delight.

The Grace of Lambs. By Manuel Komroff. Boni and Liveright. $2.

In these fourteen very short stories Manuel Komroff displays a fine thin talent for making little cameos. Each one is distinct and clear and precise in a simplicity that never quite owns the sinews of power. Tales of Russian idiots and tramps and blacksmiths and soldiers ring like a brief lyric cry. It is not wholly fair to compare Mr. Komroff to Tchekhov and Bunin and Gorki, but the comparison is inevitable. All his stories have grace and delicacy without dark blood and rich humor.

NOTE: In the review of J. H. Leuba's "Psychology of Religious Mysticism," published December 9, the price was given as $6.50. It should have been $5.

Music

Jazz Leaves Home

THERE is no such thing as a jazz concert. There are concerts of symphonic music influenced by jazz, and there are programs of true jazz, namely, fox-trots. The latter are not concerts, however, but dances—whether the audience keeps its seat or not. So Paul Whiteman in his recent concerts in New York put only two numbers of sure-enough jazz on the program. Through those numbers all Carnegie Hall swayed in its seat and shuffled surreptitiously. To the rest of the program it listened.

It is no reproach in music to be called a dance-form. Probably the first music in the world grew out of tribal dances. A whole school is built around the theory that music can best be taught by dance like exercises. Folk songs and dances are inextricably mixed. The gavottes and sarabands and minuets of the seventeenth century created new musical forms which have long outlasted their period. The fox-trot is looked upon as a sort of disreputable descendant of the dances of the past, yet in a way it has more energy than its ancestors. It is hard to believe that the stately minuet ever meant as much as the fox-trot means in the lives of modern Americans, yet it was inserted bodily into hundreds of classic sonatas. Those of us who dislike fox-trots are going to be rather unhappy with the music of the next few years. We have already seen so-called serious composers borrow rhythms from jazz and jazz composers borrow harmonies from the serious moderns until the two are often indistinguishable. We shall see the fox-trot and its child, the Charleston, enthroned still higher.

For dancing is the only active recreation left to our poor overentertained bodies. The radio does our singing, and automobiles do our walking; but our dancing we still do for ourselves. When we tire of movie horsemanship or Chautauqua oratory we don't know how to ride or orate for ourselves. So we wait until the pressure is intolerable—then we dance. No wonder that we are a little feverish about it, and that the fox-trot seethes with accumulated vitality. We have not come to the point of admitting how bored we are with watching and listening and admiring the skill of professional performers, but it is true none the less. A concert by Kreisler cannot give us half the thrill we get from our own crude reading of a sonata.

As soon as we make the fox-trot a concert number it loses its virtue. It is one more boring thing to listen to, perhaps less boring than the classics because it is only one remove from a motor activity. Not that we can keep it out of concerts, but what goes over is a by-product. The essential rhythm of the fox-trot—the plunk, plunk, plunk, plunk that B. H. Haggin described in these pages the other day—is not suitable for concert music except in very short quotations. Some of the rhythmic embroidery can go over, and the new orchestral colors the sour pervasive melancholy of the saxophones, the trombones' harsh cynicism. Most of all jazz can lend symphonic music large quantities of humor—not the sly ironic smile that serious moderns have extracted with such effort and pride, but a frank guffaw. The clowns and elephants of Deems Taylor's graphic "Circus Day," as scored by Ferdie Grofe, caused the audience to rock with laughter—a thing which never happens at the Boston Symphony. The Huckleberry Finn movement of Mr. Grofe's own "Mississippi" is an amusing cartoon; and George Gershwin's jazz opera, "135th Street," is full of delicious musical burlesque.

"135th Street" is not the jazz opera for which the world is waiting. It is a one-act sketch, and the soloists do an extravagant parody of grand operatic heroics against a background flippant, syncopated, and full of fox-trots in keeping with the cabaret scene. "Ladies and gentlemen," runs the recitative prologue grandiloquently, "come with me to Mike's colored saloon"; and Mike follows with an aria: "Sweep on, you lazy nigger; I got those Blue Monday Blues."

MARIAN TYLER

Drama

A New Carmen

AFTER a two weeks' eclipse the genius of the Moscow Art Theater Musical Studio shone forth again in its full glory with the production of "Carmenita and the Soldier" (Jolson's Theater). All the brilliance of the company had proved insufficient to redeem from triviality the two faded French operettas with which it had attempted to entertain us, and it had seemed to be wasting its talents; but "Carmen" is a work which, dramatically and musically, rises far above the level both of boulevard musical comedy and of nine-tenths of the grand opera which we are accustomed to see so solemnly performed. Its tone is, moreover, one which fits admirably the temperament of the Russians, and they threw themselves into it with a glorious abandon, moving with feline grace to its cruel rhythms and interpreting con amore its savage story. Even in its traditional form "Carmen" is one of the few operas which escape the absurd floridity of fable and musical setting that has made "operatic" an adjective of critical reproach used to describe whatever is too facilely and emotionally pretentious; and the version of the Moscow company, involving a radical revision of both the text and the score, reveals yet more clearly the barbaric passion which lies at its core. Gone is every trace of that saccharine varnish which those trained in the traditions of Italian opera invariably attempt to spread over it, and gone too are those processions, equine and human, which transform the performance at the Metropolitan into a sort of glorified circus. There remains the hard little story as Mérimée conceived it—the story of a love as brief, as fierce, as heartless, and yet as lithesome as the love of two cats or two tigers—and there remains the most inspired of the passages in which Bizet translated into staccato music the exultant ferocity of animal passions. As performed at the Jolson "Carmenita and the Soldier" is as inhumanly brilliant as the Spanish sun and as cruel as a bull fight.

In nothing does the genius of the director appear more clearly than in his arrangement of the scene and his management of the chorus. The single permanent setting consists of an open space upon which most of the action takes place and a series of bridge-like platforms, faintly suggesting walls, but remaining chiefly abstract. The chorus, disposed into ever shifting but ever beautiful groups, moves about upon these platforms and among its members is distributed a considerable portion of the music. After the manner of the classical chorus it serves as the voice of public opinion intently watching the career of Don José, and also as a means whereby his own conflicting emotions are expressed. Moreover the whole course of the drama is reflected in its motions as it laughs its amusement or draws together in excitement to peer intently down upon some climax of passion, thus constituting itself a body of perfect spectators who stimulate a sympathetic excitement in the audience and thus afford an admirable means for achieving that closer union between the auditorium and the stage which so many radical directors have sought in one way or another. One of the most seasoned of New York musical critics, who sat beside me, could not refrain from indignation at the shattering of traditions or from speculation with horror at the treatment which this company might give to "Tristan" or "Götterdämmerung"; but to me it seemed that I had never seen dramatic radicalism more completely justified by its fruits. It is true that the voices of the company are not distinguished, but art is always preferable to virtuosity, and this present performance is an almost complete realization of the company's aim of combining music with drama, since it achieves, as very few operas do, a complete integration of action, setting, and music.

Last week I confessed my fondness for revues and I must add "A Night in Paris" (Casino de Paris) to the list of those which celebrate at least the world and the flesh if not the devil with befitting frankness. It has a gorgeously beautiful and accomplished group of Gertrude Hoffman girls and it has some excellent comedy, including a burlesque of "The Green Hat" with real satiric point. Perhaps, however, I should add by way of warning that the nakedness of its performers and the roughness of its jokes will be pretty certain to offend.

At the Hampden Theater Mr. Hampden is presenting "The Merchant of Venice" in his usual highly intelligent manner and Ethel Barrymore is playing opposite him. Her Portia has both beauty and majesty. The production of "The Taming of the Shrew" which is being offered for a series of special matinees at the Klaw Theater offers two excellent performances upon the part of Rollo Peters as Petruchio and of Ann Harding as Bianca; Estelle Winwood as Katherina is not so good as either of these. "The Monkey Talks" (Harris Theater) is a melodrama of the circus which would be entirely puerile were it not for the fact that a remarkably convincing performance of the part of the monkey by a French actor named Jacques Lerner gives it the interest of an ingenious novelty. "Stronger than Love" (Belasco Theater) is a romantic tragedy of illegitimate heirs and women scorned which is marked by the same florid emotionalism which was noted in "Stolen Fruit," written by the same Dario Niccodemi. Nance O'Neil plays it well.

Japan's New Labor Party

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

Osaka, December 5

THE Farmer-Labor Party of Japan was officially born about 5 p. m. on December 1. Three hours later the Government ordered its dissolution.

The new party was not born without birth pains. Japan, like Western industrial countries, has Communist and moderate Laborites who cannot get on with each other. In January, 1924 (shortly after the British Labor Party took office), Bunji Suzuki, president of the Japan Federation of Labor (a university graduate who left the secretaryship of the Japan Unitarian Association to organize Japan's labor-union movement thirteen years ago), repudiated Russian methods of action and hailed Ramsay MacDonald as labor's savior. In February, 1924, the federation, which had been indifferent to parliamentary action, officially endorsed the principle of a labor party. But before a new party could be organized the trade-union movement itself split. About a third of Mr. Suzuki's federation, including the important Kwanto Labor Council of the capital district, turned Communist.

In the early stages of the gestation of the Farmer-Labor Party the Communists and the moderates both participated. The Communists drew up the first draft of a proposed platform, which leaked into the press and aroused excited comment. Rumors of government interference were heard. Finally, at a committee meeting held in the Tokio Municipal Street Car Workers' headquarters on November 29 the Federation of Labor withdrew from the proceedings.

The newspapers announced that the new party had died. But at the next committee meeting, held on November 30, a Communist said that his group, solicitous for the success of the new party, had decided to withdraw. Thus both Left and Right were out of the new party. Nevertheless, on December 1 sixty-four delegates from thirty-four organizations, headed by the Peasants' Union and including the stewards, the pottery workers, the mechanics, the miners, the Tokio street-car workers, the government workers, and others, met in the hut of the Tokio Y. M. C. A. to organize the party. Two or three hundred sympathizers and about two hundred policemen watched its birth. Every visitor to the hall was thoroughly searched by four energetic and inquisitive policemen, and admission was by card, which had to be filled in with the visitor's name and address.

Meanwhile, the platform as well as the membership of the new party had been carefully censored by the organizers. The planks to which most objection had been taken were omitted. The new platform no longer called for the abolition of the House of Peers, of the Privy Council, the General Staff of the army, and the naval Board of Command. The proposal for nationalization of the land had been dropped, and so had the suggestion of soldiers' councils. So had certain proposed clauses regarding the police and judicial systems. The final platform read as follows:

POLITICS

1. Abolition of the Peace Preservation Law, the Public Peace Police Law, and all other laws and regulations intended to suppress working-class movements.

2. Immediate state compensation for damage caused by the abuse of judicial and police powers.

3. Unrestricted franchise for men and women of twenty years of age, and recognition of their eligibility to elected office. Proxy vote for seamen away from home.

4. Drastic reduction of armaments.

5. Enforcement of the one-year military-service system, and state relief for families impoverished by conscription.

6. Opposition to all policies intended to militarize the people.

FINANCE

7. Abolition of taxes and tariffs on necessities of life.

8. Imposition of high progressive rates in the land and house tax, tax on interest on capital, business tax, income tax, and inheritance tax.

10. Creation of a property tax with high progressive rates.

ECONOMICS

11. Establishment of the tenant's right to participate in the management of tenant farms.

12. Acquisition by peasants of the right of control over the production and distribution of fertilizer and agricultural implements.

13. State relief for peasants and fishermen in case of loss by natural calamities.

14. State regulation of the prices of basic products and foods.

LABOR

15. Acquisition of the right to organize and to strike.

16. Acquisition of the right of collective bargaining.

17. Eight-hour day and 44-hour week; six-hour day and 33-hour week for miners.

18. Prohibition of night work, mine work, and dangerous operations for boys under 16 and women workers.

19. Six-hour day and 30-hour week for workers under 18.

20. Enactment of a minimum-wage law.

21. Equal pay for equal work, regardless of sex, age, or race.

22. Abolition of contract-labor system, apprentice system, and other backward labor systems, relics of feudalism.

23. Health and accident insurance, and preventive measures against accident and vocational diseases.

24. State subsidies for the unemployed.

25. Control of employment agencies by labor unions.

26. Revision of the factory, mines, and seamen's laws, and of the regulations for workers in government factories.

SOCIAL WELFARE

27. State support of the aged, pregnant women, and children in the non-propertied classes.

28. Adequate institutions for the health and convalescence of the working class.

29. Public provision of houses for the non-propertied classes, and tenant management of them.

30. Abolition of bureaucratic control of young people and ex-soldiers.

EDUCATION

31. Abolition of capitalistic education in the primary schools.

32. Abolition of all restrictions upon women's education and vocation.

33. Abolition of restrictions upon education and vocation of children from the dependencies and colonies.

34. Extension of the period of primary education, the cost of such education for working-class children to be borne by the state.

"I have not the slightest desire to go to Heaven!"

SAYS R. F. FOSTER in one of the most daring books ever published. "The Coming Faith" has created a sensational storm of interest. Everywhere people are discussing this astounding book. Read why the author does not believe in Heaven and Hell—why he considers orthodox religion as nothing more than ignorant superstition—what he prophesies the religion of the future will be.

"WHAT do I care about a harp and a crown, or a pair of golden slippers to walk the golden streets?"

With such utter frankness as this, R. F. Foster dares to face the dogmas of Christianity. He turns the cold light of logic upon our religious beliefs and reveals them in all their glaring inconsistency, their disregard for fact, their childish superstition. In his startling new book, "The Common Faith," he sounds a challenge that is ringing round the world.

Twenty years ago this book could not have been published. Ten years ago no magazine would have accepted this announcement. But now, with the present day freedom of thought Mr. Foster feels the time is ripe to give his message to the world.

It is an amazing message, a mighty message—a message that has set the whole world agog, that is being discussed everywhere, that must command the attention of every thinking person, whether he be an orthodox Christian or an out-and-out atheist.

What Is "The Coming Faith"?

Mr. Foster does not simply tear down our present religion and give us nothing to take its place. The startling fact is that he tells us exactly what the faith of the future will be as he foresees it. He gives us a religion in accord with the laws of nature and the truths of science, a religion that reveals the true place and destiny of mankind in the magnificent order of the universe, a religion founded on unassailable logic.

Has R. F. Foster indeed wrested from the universe its Great Secret? Has he found the Truth for which mankind has sought through all the ages of time? There are many who think so. At least everyone will want to know how he answers such tremendous questions as Where did we come from? What are we here for? Whither are we going?

It Took Forty Years to Write This Book

R. F. Foster is not a theologian. He is the internationally known authority on bridge and other games, on which he has written no fewer than seventy-eight books which are accepted as standard works in their field.

Now his keen, analytical mind focuses upon the subject of religion. Early in life his interest in this great question was stimulated by his mother, herself well known as the author of several controversial works on religion, including "The

R. F. Foster, whose astounding book "The Coming Faith" has created a world-wide sensation

World, Not the Book." "The Gospel, Not the Creed."

Forty years ago Mr. Foster began to write down the conclusions to which he had inevitably been drawn. But because his ideas were too startling, too revolutionary, he withheld them from publication up to the present. "The Coming Faith" is brutal in its frankness, it calls a spade a spade, but it is absolutely honest. Its devastating exposure of orthodox religion is founded not on prejudice but on relentless logic.

Is This Blasphemy?

"If you will be candid with yourself and get down to a concrete conception of what you call God, you will probably admit that while you speak of Him as a Spirit, your mental vision shadows forth something on the order of a venerable old man with a long beard."

"We explain the apparent impossibility of creating something out of nothing by saying that God can do anything. Who or what gave God this wonderful power that we call omnipotence?"

"Our present beliefs, collected under the name of Christianity, were absolutely unknown two thousand years ago, and will probably be unheard of two thousand years from now."

* * *

You may be shocked by such statements as the above. You may call it blasphemy, you may cry out in protest. But whatever your personal feelings may be, you MUST read "The Coming Faith," if only that you may defend your own beliefs intelligently when it is discussed before you.

No one can escape this book. It is too big, too vital, too compelling to be overlooked. Here is a mighty searchlight upon the greatest mysteries of existence. Here is a tremendous challenge to sham, hypocrisy and superstition. And here is a definite, logical, clear-cut answer to the momentous questions of life and death that concern each one of us more deeply than anything else possibly can.

Examine It Without Obligation

Because "The Coming Faith" is a book that should be in the hands of every thinking person, a special offer has been arranged that enables you to examine it for yourself without obligation to keep it.

You need send no money in advance. Simply mail the coupon below. "The Coming Faith" will be forwarded to you by mail. Deposit the price of $2.50 with the postman. Then read. If it does not immediately grip your attention; if you do not find the ideas advanced so revolutionary, so sensational, and at the same time so convincing that you want to read this enthralling book through from cover to cover, you are at liberty to return it and your money will be refunded in full without question.

But be sure to send for your copy now, as the demand is already overwhelming and increasing daily, so that the present edition must soon be exhausted.

DIPLOMACY

35. Abolition of secret diplomacy.

36. Abrogation of all unequal treaties with weaker nations, and aggressive measures.

37. Abolition of consular jurisdiction and military interference in China.

38. Abolition of all obstacles to the international organization of the working class.

The following manifesto accompanied the platform:

The days of democracy are here. The time has come for the people to establish a form of politics of their own choice. The introduction of universal manhood suffrage [Japan's electorate has recently been extended from three to fourteen million, including virtually all men above 25] does not simply mean conferring on the people the right to cast a ballot. . . .

In other words, the people under the manhood-suffrage system must organize political parties of their own, with platforms and policies peculiar to themselves. They must see that the wishes of the classes to which they belong are embodied in the administration. The old political parties have all represented the propertied classes; none has represented the working class. . . .

All the political evils of this country have sprung from this cause, and all economic and social ills have been traceable to it. We have now combined to organize the Farmer-Labor Party which, unlike the old parties, represents the masses. . . .

Less than three hours passed from the issuance of that platform and manifesto to the order of dissolution—a period so short that it is hard to believe that the officials waited to read them. Their subsequent explanations suggest the same conclusion. The Home Minister at 8 p. m. sent to the chief of the metropolitan police an offer stating that “the Farmer-Labor Party which has been organized within your jurisdiction is hereby vetoed in accordance with Article VIII, Section 2, of the Public Peace Police Law.

Several explanations of this drastic action were issued by the Home Office. The first suggested that the career, ideas, and character of the promoters of the new party were suspect; that the party, organized by unions, included women and minors, who by law are not permitted to join in political activity; and that the platform was only a screen for hidden Communist principles. Mr. Matsumura, chief of the police bureau of the Home Department, issued a cheerful, reassuring statement in which he said:

It is hoped that the Government will not be misunderstood to possess a prejudice against the so-called Labor Party. What the Government desires is to eliminate the dangerous doctrines advocated by some which might blind the people and incite them to rash conduct endangering the foundation upon which the nation is built. The Government earnestly desires that the Farmer-Labor Party may follow the open and unprejudiced path by way of healthy and reasonable methods and contribute to the development of constitutionalism in this country.

The action taken by the Government in prohibiting the Farmer-Labor Party is partly intended to provide an opportunity for sincere reflection. The authorities cannot but hope that such reflection on the part of the promoters of the organization may afford an opportunity for the realization of a sound and healthy movement.

A more specific government statement gave as the causes of dissolution:

1. Expressed communistic views.
2. Most of the items of the original platform, which were subsequently struck out, are manifestly communistic.

3. Among the items of the platform eventually adopted those relating to state housing and tenant control of such houses, and to the acquisition by the peasants of control over the production and distribution of fertilizer and agricultural implements, smack of communism.

4. In explaining the platform at the inaugural meeting of the party a speaker stated that it represented only part of the party's demands, implying that the party had principles kept in the background.

5. The following items in the platform are designed to stimulate class-consciousness: (a) Abolition of the Peace Preservation Law, the Public Peace Police Law, and all other laws intended to suppress working-class movements; (b) abolition of capitalistic education in the primary schools; (c) abolition of all unequal treaties with weaker nations, and of aggressive policies; (d) drastic reduction of armament.

When a protesting delegation from the new party called upon Mr. Matsumura he gave still another reason. He said that the action of the Communists in withdrawing voluntarily indicated that they intended to continue to exercise an influence over the new party.

The Farmer-Labor Party has already announced that it will test the Government's action in the courts, but success is unlikely. The Japan Federation of Labor expected when it withdrew, and presumably still expects, to form a substitute new party which it rather than the Peasants Union, which it regards as tinged with communism, will dominate. Its officials have publicly protested against the order of suppression, but it neither surprised nor disturbed them. They steered their course with such a contingency in mind, and the Government's action has, for the time at least, strengthened their position.

A few individuals have supported the policy of the Government, including leaders of the Seiyukai and the Seiyuhon, the opposition parties which primarily represent the interests of the landed proprietors. These gentlemen agree that there were in the platform “improper items” which could not be tolerated. The leaders of the Kenseikai, the government party, have refrained from comment. Viscount Goto, who stands outside party lines, said: “I am of the opinion that communism is only a vogue at present, and that we need not take it seriously. . . . Since the Government has put an end to the party its officials will have much difficulty in controlling the illegal activities of the radical members.” The Tokio Asahi went further than most of its colleagues. “We deplore the fact,” it said, “that the freedom of the people to form a party which is granted by the constitution is so easily oppressed by a party government. . . . It is a question whether the Government can crush a rising political party, whatever its principles or platform.” The Yomiuri called the government apprehensions “silly.”

Within a few months, then, a mild and legal Farmer-Labor Party will be formed and tolerated—unless picayune jealousies within the ranks make it necessary to form two parties. The electorate will be four or five times as large at the next election as at the last; manhood suffrage for all over 25 now prevails. Under the old suffrage system, about 2 per cent of the municipal and village counselors were farmers or laborers; if the vote were proportionate, they would have eight or nine representatives among the 460 members of the national Diet. The organizers naturally hope that with universal male suffrage they will do better. They count on the factory workers of Tokio and Osaka, the miners of Wakamatsu, the steel workers of Edamitsu, and the tenant farmers of Niigata as surely theirs.

SINCE PRINCE CAROL of Rumania has become a front-page favorite it is important that we should have a clear idea of the causes of his recent renunciation of the throne. A summary of the news should help:

1. Carol renounced the throne out of loyalty to Zizi Lambrino, his morganatic wife and the mother of three of his children.

2. Carol renounced his throne for love of a beautiful Italian woman known as the "Princess Lupescu," who has been registered at the same hotel in Milan.

3. Carol was forced to abdicate because of his part in intrigues directed against his father, King Ferdinand.

4. Carol supported his father against the ruling clique headed by Premier Bratianu, Queen Marie, and her favorite, Barbu Stirbey. The King used the Prince's letter of abdication as a threat against the power of the Queen and her friends—and his bluff was called.

5. Carol resigned as the result of certain airplane scandals in which he was involved.

6. Carol retired in order to enter the airplane business.

7. Carol plans to head a Fascist revolt in Rumania.

8. Carol's female companion, "Princess Lupescu," is none other than his morganatic wife, Zizi, in disguise.

9. The "Princess Lupescu" is not a princess but is the daughter of a Rumanian merchant and the wife of a Rumanian army officer.

10. The lady in the case is neither Zizi nor Madame Lupescu, but Madame Tampeanu, also the wife of a Rumanian army officer; and the whole trouble started when she threw a bouquet of roses into the Prince's car at the recent races in Bucharest.

11. Carol abdicated on account of his connection with the recent Hungarian counterfeiting scandal.

There, that tells the whole story. It is important to have the facts straight in regard to great international events.

PRESTO! SAID THE MODERN CAESAR, and found himself sitting on the top of Italy's Government, with only the King for company and the voice of the Opposition no longer heard in the land. It is perhaps only natural that Signor Mussolini, having achieved this triumph with comparatively little trouble, should consider his powers above the ordinary. Accordingly, without pausing for breath, he has issued an order which will test his capacities to the utmost: in five years Rome is to be restored to its majesty under Augustus. Just like that. The Theater of Marcellus, the Capitol, the Pantheon are to be surrounded by great open squares, with broad avenues leading to them; new schools, houses, baths, gardens, and playgrounds for good Fascists are to be prepared; "vast, well-ordered, powerful . . . Rome must again become the wonder of the whole world." But why stop there? There is the Forum, thirty feet below the level of the modern city. Why not reduce Rome to its old level, restore the ancient temples, including the sublime Temple of Castor and Pollux, of whose former magnificence only three noble columns are left, banish the Christians who demolished all this grandeur, reline the endless corridors of the Palatine with marble, hang them with silk and fill them with slaves, and move in, Emperor Benito the Great, to rule fittingly over all? While this is being done by competent artisans under the master's eye, there is another little matter that might be attended to; one troublesome voice is still lifted in Rome, one voice that Augustus certainly would not have tolerated. From the Vatican still comes defiance of the Fascist Government; the Holy See is not yet ready to accept violence as a creed or Mussolini as a dictator. And to the firm and unequivocal stand taken by the Osservatore Romano, the official Vatican organ, the Government can only reply a little timidly that it "regrets" that such statements should be printed.

GRADUALLY THE FACTS about the United States Tariff Commission are coming to light. Senator Norris has again rendered a great public service by revealing the conditions under which David J. Lewis, after he had signed the recommendation for a lower rate on sugar, declined what was virtually a bribe from the President of the United States. The bribe was his job as commissioner; the terms were that he should write his resignation, to be made effective whenever Mr. Coolidge saw fit. In other words, he could continue to draw $7,500 a year from the federal Treasury if he would conform to the President's extortionate tariff views and help fatten the chief contributors to his campaign fund. That Mr. Lewis refused, and in consequence was kicked out of the commission, does him honor. But what shall we say of a President who thus flouts the law and attempts to bludgeon a high appointive official into dishonesty? Let us hope the tariff bomb Mr. Costigan threw, which is discussed elsewhere in this issue, will shake loose more facts. For the Lewis case does not stand alone.

COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING for students in our schools and colleges has been having a hard time of it lately. The Interdenominational Student Conference at Evanston, Illinois, passed resolutions against it, while in Cleveland the Board of Education has voted to eliminate military training entirely from the high schools of the city. This courageous action was taken by a vote of 6 to 1 despite the advice of Newton D. Baker, a flood of oratory from various so-called patriotic organizations, and opposition from an influential section of the press. Another plea against Prussianization comes from Atlantic City, where the convention of the Women's Boards of Foreign Missions went on record as against military training camps for young men. Events like these have naturally been annoying to our militarists; and they have been annoyed. The National Security League, for instance, has shown its irritation by calling for the resignation of one of its directors, Professor William Bradley Otis of the College of the City of New York, because he opposed the continuance of compulsory drill when the faculty met recently to pass upon the question. We congratulate Professor Otis.

THE FANTASTIC and staggering sums now spent by the Government and its assistant, the taxpayer, for the enforcement of laws in the United States are not large enough, apparently, for certain of our worthy citizens. They propose a law for the registration and deportation of aliens, among the provisions of which is the finger-printing of the 3,000,000 aliens already in this country and of those who shall enter in the future. How this law is to be enforced, of course, the bill does not say, nor does it contain any estimate of the cost of such a proceeding. Presumably the alien, having read about the new measure in the morning paper, will dutifully present himself for registration at the proper time and place; he will, that is, if human nature executes a complete right-about-face overnight. Or maybe a corps of busy bees in the shape of enforcement clerks will fly up and down the land, unerringly picking out the alien from the citizen, extracting from him the proper information and writing it down correctly in a little book, all out of pure love for the government and without thought of pecuniary emolument. But this sort of thing has not happened to date. Our immigration laws should be revised: the proposed amendments for admitting the alien relatives of citizens and persons who are in process of becoming citizens, without quota restrictions, should be adopted; the Japanese exclusion legislation should be abolished; and the proposal for registration should be dropped into the wastebasket where it belongs.

THE SEATING OF GERALD P. NYE of North Dakota by the Senate was the surprise of the present session. On their face the legal arguments against the validity of the appointment were impressive. We cannot, however, fail to be convinced when lawyers of the high standing of Senators Borah and Norris, who in such matters can be trusted to put conscience and principle and legal authority above partisanship, vote to seat Mr. Nye. We are content to take their word for it that the State of North Dakota is entitled to be represented by two Senators until a new election can be held. Of Mr. Nye, who is as young as Senator La Follette, we hear only favorable things. He has made an excellent impression in Washington and has shown his colors by openly declaring himself a Progressive Republican. His accession has given fresh courage to the small progressive group and has correspondingly disturbed the Coolidge regulars who thought that their control of the Senate would be almost complete.

INDEED, THE REGULAR REPUBLICAN machine has reason for anger. Mr. Nye was elected by two votes only because there were a number of absentees when the vote was taken. Mr. La Follette's assignment to Republican committees after Senator Butler had declared that it would never, never take place still rankles with the Old Guard. Meanwhile the barrage of the opposition to Coolidgeism is not only not checked but grows in volume. On top of the Mellon-Donovan revelations has come the charge that no less than one hundred employees who do not figure in the civil-service list have been surreptitiously carried on the pay roll of that mass of rottenness, the Alien Property Custodian's Office. One of these secret employees on the pay roll up to last fall was Miss Mary Randolph, private secretary to the President's wife! Like the others, she was paid by a tax on the seized German property. It is true that the present Alien Property Custodian declares that the roll is now purged of Miss Randolph and all the rest, but as a sample of what has been going on under Mr. Coolidge this is striking. In the Senate Mr. La Follette has properly demanded of the Secretary of State the turning over to the Senate of everything relating to the situation created by the threat of the United States to withdraw its recognition of Mexico if that government does not remodel some of its laws to suit our taste. Senator Shipstead has demanded of the State Department the facts as to its activities in relation to the World Court. Finally, the Federal Trade Commission has been forced to inquire again into the Mellon aluminum trust, this time on complaint of unfair competition.

A NEWS AGENCY reports that while a week ago the acceptance of the World Court seemed absolutely safe, "It is now seriously in danger, and there is an even chance that it will be defeated." Senator Copeland says that he would like to get out of the promise he has given to vote for the Court. Senators Fernald of Maine and Williams of Missouri have come out against it. The fate of the proposal now depends upon the adoption of cloture in the Senate. If that can be put through the proposal can be passed; if not, it is extremely doubtful whether the Court will come to a vote at this session of Congress. Senator Shipstead in his attack upon the Court said: "It is organized for war; it is an organization for carrying on war against any state which refuses to bow to its will."

WHEN THE AMALGAMATED Clothing Workers of America opened in 1923 the first commercial bank to be established by labor in New York City even the most sanguine could hardly hope that within two and a half years deposits would have increased from half a million dollars to thirteen times that amount. But that has happened, and the Amalgamated Bank of New York has now recognized that growth by moving from its original quarters in the second story of an old building on East Fourteenth Street to the ground floor of the Tiffany Building on the west side of Union Square. This building, which forty years ago was identified with all that was most aristocratic in the city's business, has now passed by a turn of fate into the hands of a labor union made up chiefly of foreign-born proletarians. Most important about the bank, though, is the fact that it is a limited-dividend corporation, the profits of which cannot go above 10 per cent. In this day of extortionate and almost inconceivable profits by many other financial institutions this fact is of cardinal importance in entitling the Amalgamated Bank to public support.

HIGHLY FLATTERING to Americans is the movement in England, sponsored by Lord Bledisloe, to make a national park after our model by purchasing the Forest of Dean and the Wye Valley as a public playground. Lord Bledisloe is not only parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, he is one of the four Verderers who still hold court in the ancient Speech House in the Forest of Dean to hear cases of "vert and venison"—although there are now no deer left in the forest. The Speech House itself was formerly the house of Sir Walter Raleigh; the half dozen collieries are tucked out of sight in the woods and besides them there are only a few small hamlets. The Manchester Guardian declares that there is here "a finer combination of forest, hill, lake, and river scenery than in any other part of England," all of which is coupled with archaeological treasures dating back to the Romans. The new government School of Forestry is already established in this domain. As for the Wye Valley, it contains such famous places as Tintern Abbey and Symonds Yat. Lord Bledisloe has chosen our Yosemite Park as the model to be followed, and believes that the park could be made self-supporting if camping facilities were provided at reasonable prices and the annual timber-cut utilized. Finally he would have the four Verderers once more given worth-while duties by having them charged with the administration of the park after it is acquired.

WHEN WE ANNOUNCED last spring a prize contest for college students who should spend their summer vacation at work in factories or mines, on farms or railroads, one of our reasons was to encourage what we described as "experiments in facing the realities of industrial America." Capital and labor, we felt, were textbook abstractions to most students; and the note of surprise which dominated the accounts they eventually sent us justified our impression. Whatever the students may have given to their jobs, the jobs gave them a glimpse of an entirely new world. The fatigue of merely carrying a heavy pick and shovel to the place where they are to be used; the disgust and nausea after a day among the odors of a hot, dirty restaurant kitchen; at the end of a week of physical labor the weariness that makes the lightest reading an impossible effort—these are illuminating experiences to students who feel, as some of the contestants did at first, that workers are made of different clay from themselves. The contest was judged by Florence Kelley of the National Consumers' League, Pierrepont B. Noyes of the Oneida Community, Jerome Davis of the faculty of Yale University, Oswald Garrison Villard, editor of The Nation, and in place of President Johnston of the Machinists' Union, whose illness prevented him from serving, Leo Wolman of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. They awarded the first prize of $125 to Margaret Sutherland of Antioch College, whose essay will appear in next week's Nation, the second prize of $75 to Robert Leeper of Allegheny College, and the third prize of $25 to A. George Purdue of Yale University.

Washington—Man or Waxwork?

AT a dinner given by the Sons of the American Revolution Rupert Hughes declared George Washington was "a great card-player, a distiller of whiskey, and a champion curser, and that he danced for three hours without stopping"; also that Washington "never prayed and persistently avoided any participation in communion." About Valley Forge Mr. Hughes was equally annoying. He said that the worst of the suffering there was caused by our ancestral war profiteers, and not by the cold weather.

Whatever else he said is not recorded, as his speech came to a close amid imprecations. But why? All that Mr. Hughes said is a commonplace to the student of history. The great George Washington himself would have no doubt been greatly astonished at the indignation of the Sons. Washington did own and operate a whiskey distillery; it was one of the most profitable enterprises on his Mount Vernon estate. In Haworth's book on Washington as a farmer you will find an account of its operation and a partial record of its profits. The New York Public Library has a recipe left by Washington for making "small beer." He drank wine with his meals, being especially fond of Madeira. He swore, on occasion, like a cavalry sergeant. His career lay in the midst of infinite exasperations and stupidities, and many persons will prefer to think of him as a human being rather than as a waxwork.

Land-owning and card-playing appear to have been among his chief pursuits. The acquisition of land was a sort of passion with him, and he was jealous of every encroachment on his rights as an owner. After he had served his two terms as President we find him making a trip to western Pennsylvania and evicting squatters from land which he owned but had never seen—and which they had cleared and settled. In reading his letters and diaries one is impressed by the huge amount of card-playing that he managed to crowd into one life. Taken altogether, he must have spent years at the card table. "At home all day over cards," his diary says at one point. He liked to play for money, but only for small amounts. "We danced all night," is another record in his diary.

Most of us think of Valley Forge as a place where the army froze while Washington prayed. There was no danger of the army freezing at Valley Forge. The troops were housed in warm huts, and there was plenty of wood to burn. But at times they almost starved, although the country round about was full of food. The farmers sent their grain and meat to Philadelphia and sold these provisions to the British army because the British paid in gold and paid more than the Americans. Washington's appeals to the patriotism of the Pennsylvania people were unavailing, so in the last resort he sent a column under General Greene to seize food in the neighboring counties. This caused a tremendous uproar among the profiteers.

Washington was cold in manner and rather dull. He had no delicate fancies, no flights of imagination. He had no conception of democracy, or of a society founded on anything but property. His strength lay in fortitude—in strength of will—combined with caution and a hard, do-it-today practicality. He had a pompous person, in a way, and was easily wounded by slights to his vanity. When he was elected President he wanted to be called "His Mightiness the President," and he never forgave the Speaker of the House for making facetious remarks on the subject.

The Coal Crisis—Whose Fault?

A FEW days ago among other valuables disposed of at an auction sale of household goods were four tons of hard coal. The neighbors crowded around and the bidding was lively. The lot was finally knocked down for $139—nearly $35 a ton! Meanwhile the operators and the miners have walked out of the Union League Club in New York City with nothing remaining of their two weeks' conference but bitter statements—each side accusing the other of deadlocking further negotiations. The operators charge the miners, and particularly Mr. Lewis, with obstinate obstruction because of refusal to "arbitrate." Mr. Lewis charges the operators with a deliberate muddling of the word "arbitration"; with refusal to show their accounting records; with no willingness to make concessions in spite of the large concessions already made by the miners; with being governed by a minority group. And there we are. The strike has nearly completed its fifth month, with no settlement in sight. To January 1, according to an estimate of the New York Times, the miners had lost $113,850,000 in wages and the nation had lost 55,000,000 tons of potential coal.

The last agreement terminated on September 1, 1925, after running for two years. Early in July the miners formulated their proposal for a new agreement. It called primarily for a 10 per cent increase in wages for contract workers, $1 a day increase for day workers, and for the check-off—a method by which the operator collects union dues on pay-roll days. Negotiations between the two sides opened on July 9. The operators asked the miners to agree to arbitration if direct negotiations failed. The miners refused—on grounds presently to be explained. Amidst the pleasures of Atlantic City the wrangling went on for weeks. All to no purpose; and on September 1 the men left the pits. Since that date various plans have been put forward by third parties, looking toward a settlement. The proposal of Governor Pinchot was accepted by the miners but spurned by the operators. Neither side took much cognizance of the so-called Engineers' Plan, or the plan proposed by the super-power committee of the League for Industrial Democracy. On December 29 operators and miners went into conference again in New York, and the chairman, Alvan Markle, led off with a plan for arbitration and publicity of accounting records which sounded reasonable. In acceding to its principles the operators appear to have made a genuine concession. But the miners refused to accept it. On January 12 the conference broke up as we have seen.

On the face of it the operators have the best case before the bar of public opinion. Their stout stand for arbitration, their considerable concession in allowing daylight on the accounting records under the Markle scheme, seem both fair and reasonable. Why will not the miners arbitrate? Why are they so pig-headed? What are they afraid of? Well, this is what they are afraid of: In the first place, according to Mr. Lewis, arbitration covering wages only is a false arbitration. It passes upon and delimits the human life of 150,000 miners, leaving the delimiting of prices—and hence the property rights of the owners—completely outside the picture. Life is to be arbitrated but not property. Real arbitration, says the miners' chief, must comprehend both. If the miners are to have their wages fixed, operators must have their prices and profits restrained. On such a basis the miners are willing to go into arbitration at the drop of the hat. They would welcome any decision for government regulation of profits and wages—foregoing their demands for a 10 per cent increase and modifying their demands for the check-off. They apparently object to the Markle plan because, while the books of the operator would be shown, arbitration would apply to wage only.

Secondly, the miners fear wage arbitration because of its disastrous results in the 1919 settlement. The story they tell is this: A double-checked statistical survey showed that a 27 per cent increase in wages was in order. The findings of the impartial statistician were duly presented to the arbitration board of three—a miner, an operator, a representative of the public. The public member was ready to vote for the 27 per cent increase and said as much. After a midnight session with the operator member, he voted for only a 17 per cent increase. The miners claim that the psychology of a "public" member is usually identical with that of the operator, and foreign to that of the miner. No matter how honest, how fair, how sincere the third member tries to be, he just naturally gravitates to the operator's point of view; as educated men, fellow members of the dominant class, their habit patterns run in pairs and they unconsciously stick together.

It is now time to refresh our memory as to certain profound observations of President Coolidge—ukases delivered from the summer capital while the Atlantic City negotiations were in process. The Nation has dwelt on them before and will continue to dwell on them. There is a growing realization that the only way out of this industrial harkari in anthracite is for the President to seize the sword which Roosevelt and Wilson brandished in earlier deadlocks and settle the strike by government intervention. With the findings of the 1922 Coal Commission at hand, the possibilities of a just and lasting settlement are greatly improved. The White House maintains an impenetrable silence and a distinguished inability to do anything to date. But when it looked as if the miners and operators must come to some agreement, the President, through his official spokesman, declared himself not only ready to take up the sword but apparently to use tanks and Big Berthas as well:

"The government has decided on positive steps to be taken in case of a coal strike."

A plan has been thought out "which President Coolidge believes will be effective in the event the miners and operators fail to reach a settlement by the end of August."

The President is "determined to prevent a coal strike. . . . He has let the operators know that he will exert all the pressure possible to keep the hard-coal mines operating and prevent the condition of three years ago when the public suffered greatly."

"It is thought by those who know him well that the plan will be of a revolutionary nature."

These are fine words; the time has come to make them good. The public has suffered greatly, and every day that suffering grows. The hardships of miners' wives and children will shortly reach the proportions of a tragedy. The hour has struck for President Coolidge to do something if he has it in him.

Russia's War Guilt Becomes Plainer

JUST before Christmas Associated Press newspapers announced what was said to be the sensational disclosure of a hitherto unknown document proving that Russia was guiltless in 1914 and desirous of avoiding hostilities. The New York Times carried half a column under the headline: "Prove Russia Tried to Avert Great War." This supposedly startling document is the minutes of the Russian Ministerial Conference of July 24, 1914, and it is published in the January issue of Current History, together with an editorial introduction by Robert C. Binkley, librarian of Stanford University. It is alleged to prove that "the original intent of the Russian Government (perhaps, by implication, of the French Government also) was honorable and pacific."

What are the facts in the case? While it is, perhaps, true that this is the first time that the document has been published in full in English, its contents have been known by scholars for some time. The decisions of this conference are summarized in detail in the "Diary" of Baron M. F. Schilling, Chief of Chancellery of the Russian Foreign Office in 1914 (English edition, pp. 30-31), which was published in German nearly two years ago and appeared in an English edition early last year. So much for the novelty of the information, though we may be grateful to Mr. Binkley for giving us the text in English in easily accessible form.

The implications of the document are even further from the assertions in the article and the Associated Press dispatch. Instead of being a proof of Russian desire for peace, it presents evidence to the contrary, demonstrating that Russia took measures for mobilization a day earlier than we hitherto had supposed. In 1920 Professor Fay could find no evidence for mobilization measures before the conference on the afternoon of the 25th. We now know that the moment Russia learned of the terms of the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia, and before Serbia had an opportunity to reply, she began the preparation for those military measures which inevitably led to the European War. The ministers, with the Czar's approval, authorized the mobilization of the four great military districts of central and southern Russia, discussed in the secret Crown Council of February 8, 1914, and of the Baltic and Black Sea fleets. We know from the secret Austrian documents that Austria had planned to make the demands upon Serbia so extreme that Serbia would be unlikely to accede, with the result that Austria would intervene to punish Serbia by armed force. But the Russians did not know this at the time.

As to the alleged conciliatory plans urged upon Serbia, these were probably subterfuge. Russia did not want Serbia to declare war on Austria for several reasons. It would have put Serbia in a bad light before European opinion, which was still shocked at the assassination of the Archduke, and would have greatly handicapped Russia in her plan of intervention in behalf of Serbia. Also it would have precipitated hostilities too soon for Russia.

This ardent desire of the French and Russians to gain time is seen in the fact that the most insistent demand of both governments, as soon as they learned the terms of the Austrian ultimatum, was that Serbia have more than forty-eight hours to prepare her reply. Quite as illuminating, as bearing upon the Serbian reply, is the knowledge we now possess that it was drafted in the French Foreign Office at Paris by the deputy political director, Berthelot.

To have had Serbia make an appeal to the Great Powers would have been a gesture of real import for propaganda, similar to the appeal of Belgium which Sir Edward Grey later wormed out of that country after an effort. Still further, we cannot be sure that the words of advice to the Serbians were not for public consumption only. At least, we know that the Serbians ordered the mobilization of their entire army three hours before they sent the messenger to Austria to deliver the answer to the ultimatum.

Finally, as even Mr. Binkley admits, the guilt of Russia is not to be established or demolished by one document. It rests upon the plans of Izvolski from 1908 to 1914; on the memorandum of Sazonov to the Czar on December 8, 1913, telling him that Russia must have the Straits and that they could not be secured without European complications leading to a general war; on the minutes of the secret Crown Council of February 8, 1914, at which the Russians decided not to strike Turkey unaided but to await the expected general European war; upon Sazonov's decision to order Russian general mobilization on July 29, successfully executed the next day, when Germany's pressure on Austria was at its height and when there was every prospect for a pacific settlement; upon the full admission of Dobrorolski that the Russian authorities knew that nothing on earth could stop a European war after the mobilization order was sent out on July 30; upon Sazonov's declaration to England and France on July 27 that he would tolerate no moderating influence upon the Russian program; and upon Izvolski's proud boast in early August, 1914, "C'est ma guerre!" How much good faith there was in Sazonov's proposals for European conferences in 1914 is well illustrated by the fact that his most insistent plea for a conference came late on July 31, two days after he had determined upon war and twenty-four hours after he had authorized the order which meant irrevocable war. Sazonov has been afforded two opportunities recently to defend himself against the charge that he precipitated the European War through the premature and unjustifiable Russian mobilization, but even he has not cited this Ministerial Conference of the 24th as evidence in his behalf. Much more relevant and convincing is Sazonov's own statement in 1916:

Herr Bethmann-Hollweg maintains that France and Russia would never have dared to accept the challenge of Germany if they had not been sure of the support of England. But the real political situation was the following, even if the Chancellor will not admit it: in reality France and Russia, notwithstanding their profound love for peace and their sincere efforts to avoid bloodshed, had decided to break the pride of Germany at any price and to make her stop, once for all, treading on the toes of her neighbors.

But we do not have to rely upon general argument or circumstantial evidence to prove the war-like intentions of Russia and France from the 24th onward. General Dobrorolski in his authoritative memoir on the mobilization of the Russian army (p. 21) tells us that from the point of view of the Russian General Staff "war had been a certainty" from the 24th "onward." General measures preparatory to war were proclaimed on the 26th.

Unemployment in England

By JOHN A. HOBSON

A TRADE depression of unprecedented duration and intensity has held Britain in its grip ever since the brief post-war boom burst at the close of 1920. The statistics of unemployment during these five years show several brief periods of partial recovery. From the nadir of June, 1921, when the unemployed figure, reinforced by strikes, registered 23.1 per cent of trade-union members, we floundered on through 1922, with a figure varying between 16 and 14 per cent, to drop in 1923 to an average of about 11 per cent. Early in 1924 a distinct revival was indicated, which brought down unemployment to 7.2 per cent in June; but the figure soon fell back a little, and through the rest of that year there was a worsening of the position, passing from 8 to 9 per cent. The setback grew in strength until last June, since when a slight and slow recovery has been recorded, the average for October standing at 11.3. This recent improvement, which still leaves our volume of unemployed at some 1,200,000, is, however, less significant than it appears, because there has been some transfer from the unemployment-insurance lists to the outdoor relief of the poor law.

In other words, there are as yet no clear signs of any substantial improvement. So far as unemployment goes we are bumping along a bottom that is distinctly lower than ever before recorded in our industrial history. And yet within my lifetime I have known several depressions in which far more misery and active disturbance have prevailed among the workers. The operation of the insurance acts, which now cover nearly all the organized trades of the country, has greatly alleviated the stress of the situation; and, taken in conjunction with the rent restriction acts and a looser administration of the poor law, has bought off exasperation and despair which might easily have brought a violent insurrection. Among the ignorant well-to-do (harassed by high taxation, high prices, and a shortage of domestic service) there prevails a widespread conviction that the "dole" (insurance relief) is responsible for most of the unemployment, for "Why should a person work when he or she can be kept comfortable in idleness at the expense of others?"

There is no substance in this general charge. It has recently been examined and rebutted by an official committee of inquiry. In the first place, the insurance relief is in part the proceeds of the weekly deductions from their wages when they work. Secondly, the trade unions and the official employment bureaus are interested in stopping all cases of imposture and malingering and, as they have close access to the facts in each case, cannot make many errors. Thirdly, the rate of unemployed allowances is, except in a few unskilled trades, much lower than the ordinary weekly earnings for work done. While, therefore, there must be among the recipients of the dole a certain number of idlers who could get work if they were willing, the quantity is negligible in relation to the size of the problem. There is no lack of applicants for any job that is going.

Some difficulty and some wastage may be attributed to the obstacles set by trade unions in the way of transfers of labor from one trade to another. It is likely that the building trades could usefully absorb some labor from outside their ranks, if they would run the risks of an oversupply such as prevailed thirty years ago. But to no other considerable trade does this apply. The problem which presents itself to employers is that of a deficiency of markets for the goods which they could produce with their available plant and labor, at a price which would cover costs of production and yield a minimum profit. The term "costs of production" bulks big in any considered approach to such a problem, and here a clear rift appears in public opinion. Most employers hold that wages should come down, in order that England may resume the place in the world's trade she held before the war. Most workers insist that a fall of wages, besides the injury it would inflict on their standard of living, would, by reducing the purchasing power of the people, diminish the volume of consumption and so produce more unemployment in trades supplying the home market. These informed advocates also insist that more science, better organization, and more enlightened finance would enable industry to make economies of production adequate to lower costs without taking it out of labor. They point especially to America, where high wages have notoriously stimulated greater use of machinery and other economies of overhead charges, enabling firms to outcompete low-waged competitors in many lines of manufacture. It is common knowledge that, in the application of electrical equipment for industry, transport, agriculture, and domestic uses, we have much to learn, not only from America but from several continental countries. We were sluggish in new enterprises before the war, and we are not rich enough now to embark quickly on new expensive improvements.

A good deal of our present trouble is due, however, to causes directly connected with the war. The distribution of our unemployment shows that the trades suffering most are iron and steel, ship-building, engineering, the miscellaneous metals, and mining. Now, these trades have been injuriously affected in two ways. They were excessively stimulated and overdeveloped, both with capital and labor, for war purposes, so that in any case the return of peace would have deflated them. Secondly, they are especially injured by the reduced purchasing power of most other countries, the contraction of the world market due to the damages and dislocations of industry and finance during and following the war. For these are among our great export trades, and the shrinkage in value, still more in volume, of our export trade is universally recognized as a chief direct cause of the persistency of the trade depression. About 30 per cent of our total production is normally designed for export; and as the reduction of our exports during the past two years cannot be put at less than 25 per cent, it is evident that this fact is enough in itself to account for the greater part of our unemployment. Allowance here ought doubtless to be made for some substitution of home sales for foreign sales. But to us it appears as if the recovery of our pre-war position in the world market were essential to our economic safety and success. The intensified nationalism not only in Europe but in Asia, a political war product, has brought with it an economic policy of self-sufficiency, which by protective tariffs and subsidies seeks artificially to foster home industries and to reduce foreign-trade relations to a minimum.

It is probable that even before the war the advance made by other nations along the road of capitalist enterprises was tending to diminish our supremacy in the main lines of export and of transport. But the total quota of foreign trade was so large that a smaller proportionate holding of it would have sufficed for our needs. And this is still the answer we may make to our pessimists. If the world can be restored to peace and prosperity, rid of the huge wastes on arms and wars, with the enlargement of every sort of international intercourse that would ensue, our share of export trade would doubtless suffice to meet our import bill and leave a not inconsiderable surplus for overseas investment, as in pre-war days. The notion that we are permanently handicapped by competition with lower-waged nations in a limited market is refuted by facts. Though our present export trade is cut down, it represents not a smaller but a slightly larger proportion of the aggregate world trade than in 1913. The notion that by a general reduction of wages we can materially strengthen our industries ignores the reactions of such a policy on trade as a whole. A recent study of unemployment published by the International Labor Office at Geneva thus succinctly states the case:

The diminution of wages has sometimes been suggested as a means of alleviating the situation in exporting industries. The immediate effects of such diminution would appear to be to assist the industries concerned into securing foreign markets. Such relief as might be given in this way must, however, be essentially at the expense of domestic trade; for the reduction of wages will be reflected immediately in a diminution of home demand. Whether such preferential treatment of the exporting section is desirable or not depends to some extent upon the relative importance of domestic and foreign demand and the conditions in the respective industries supplying the demand.

That our people should have to accept wage reductions and work longer hours in order to reduce poverty and unemployment by capturing more foreign markets is a doctrine as economically foolish as it is politically dangerous. And yet that is the policy of the bulk of our ruling classes at the present time. They profess to deplore the hard times. "But hard times require hard measures. We are producing less than before the war, and we find it more difficult to sell this reduced product at a profit. The workers to whom in war and post-war emergencies concessions were made of wage rises and reductions of hours must give them up as sacrifices to the needs of the nation." Such is the contention. The sheltered trades, those supplying goods and services for domestic consumption, are naturally the chief subjects of attack. For they include the public and semi-public services where wage rises have been largest, advancing most from a low level before the war.

It is, no doubt, true that these, together with some other strongly organized domestic industries, such as railways and building, have, by raising the cost of their services, kept up prices and taxes and so impaired the real wages of less favored workers. There is some immediate divergence of interests between the sheltered and unsheltered trades which the opponents of the labor movement seek to play upon. But there is no chance of breaking the solidarity of labor by such tactics. The very fact that the main assault on wages is well advertised in the public inquiries recently set up into the railroad and mining industries has evolved a working-class opinion solidly against concessions on wages and hours.

The superficial case both in mines and railways for lower wages and longer hours is strong. A large proportion of the mines cannot afford to pay the present costs without a subsidy, and the railways are badly hit by reduced receipts and higher costs, and are only paying dividends out of back reserves. But the workers with sane obstinacy insist that a way must be found for maintaining a decent standard of living, and when they are told by statisticians that the country is not rich enough to meet that demand they rightly refuse to accept this verdict. They are aware partly from experience, partly from a sort of instinct, of the sophistry of the capitalistic contentions. They believe, and justly, that if they persist in their demand for a human standard certain industries can and will be reorganized technically and financially so as to be able to meet this demand. For the wastes both in our railroads and in our mines from stock management, overlapping, want of coordination and cooperation, not to speak of technical improvements, are attested by plenty of good expert evidence. The report of the coal commission some time next spring will bring the matter to an issue. The present subsidy policy no one defends except as a stop-gap. The purse with which this Government seeks to buy off trouble is ill furnished, and other claimants, such as agriculture, press their claims. Unless, for reasons so far unrevealed, the industrial clouds pass away, next summer will be a testing time for this Government. Nothing has been done in the way of internal developments or export credits to relieve unemployment. Protection is being introduced piece-meal, and possibly may by that time have included the iron and steel trades. The sudden restoration of the gold standard indubitably checked the slight revival of export trade in the early months of last year and aided the continuous clamor for reduced wages.

There remain, however, two considerations which should temper excessive despondency in our industrial outlook. Part of our unemployment is undoubtedly attributive to the temporary check on emigration during the past ten years. Whereas in 1913 our net emigration amounted to 329,073 the average for the last five years hardly exceeds half that number. With revival of world trade and a more liberal policy in our overseas empire, to compensate the restrictive policy of the United States, some considerable relief to our surplus population may be anticipated. Lastly, there are many valid indications of prosperity in our internal trades, especially in those catering for luxuries and comforts, attesting a rise in the standard of living for considerable sections of our population. The rapid and profitable expansion of automobiles and their accessories, the new manufacture of artificial silk, the increased national expenditure upon holidays and recreation, drink and tobacco, the large profits made in retail trades serving the working classes, have considerable significance, in view of the dismal pictures of our poverty and economic impotence drawn by some of our scaremonger visitors to America. The truth is, I think, that while the war has left us a little poorer than before in national income, that reduced income is distributed somewhat better in favor of the general body of the people.

Wages for Wives

II. The Home as a Joint-Stock Company

By DORIS STEVENS

EXCEPT, perhaps, for a few obscure tribes in remote hinterlands, women are the only people in the world who still perform work without pay. This is one of the situations which feminists seek to remedy in making a world kinder to women.

When one flatly states that women in the main are still slaves, the statement is usually scoffed at. Yet women in the home throughout the world underwork or overwork, as the case may be, without money reward. They receive their "keep" as do slaves. They receive their clothes as do slaves. They receive gifts—money, jewels, cars, as does the favorite slave a shining trinket. From a new hat to a new palace they get everything except a recognized share of the family income. Even with the more generous masters it is too often a dole, and like all doles, given grudgingly.

Home and mother have suffered under an avalanche of oratory, white carnations, and poetic nonsense. Home, that foundation of the state, that sacred institution, and mother's knee, well-worn, have alternated on the tips of the more articulate male at the slightest public provocation. Was there any threat of rebellion to stir the orator? Probably not. Slaves are slow to rebel. Yet every century has seen its handful of women challenging these unsubstantial public proclamations. Now that women are more articulate, greater numbers are asking that experiments be tried. The modern woman says: We have become so impressed with the importance of home and mother that we propose to do something about them. Even if we should do the wrong thing first, still we intend to try first one experiment and then another in this vast laboratory.

Wages for Wives is a faulty title. No one seriously demands pay for being a wife. The state of wifehood and husbandhood is presumably a state entered into by two people voluntarily for love. We need not consider exceptions to this. In a proper conception of love neither husband nor wife pays the mate for love received. One does not ask pay for falling into a delightful emotional state. Parenthood should also be voluntary and desired by both parents. In a proper conception of parenthood neither parent would ask pay, one from the other, for contributing to the production of a child. The problem then becomes one of how we shall pay the woman in the home for services—occupational, professional—not for services of mutual love and mutual parenthood, although services done lovingly should not act as a penalty on the woman's value but should rather enhance her value.

Bob and Sally desire to become husband and wife, and do. Later they want to become parents and so become. We shall put Sally in that class of women which comprises 90 per cent of our home women, that class in which no domestic service can be summoned to lighten the tasks. Sally, we have assumed, is a volunteer wife and mother. What is her work in the home? Sally is mistress of the household. That is an executive job highly diversified, which embraces many departments. Sally becomes nurse to the child in its early infancy, a highly paid profession when done by one not the mother. Sally is the major body attendant and educational guide until at least adolescence, a profession moderately well paid when done by a governess, teacher, or tutor. Sally is the mistress of the family wardrobe, a job well paid when done by a seamstress. Sally is often the bookkeeper and cashier—both standardized occupations outside the home. And lastly she is shopper, cook, laundress, chambermaid, baker, stoker, and char. Like all persons who overwork in whatever field, Sally, unless she is a super-genius, risks becoming a drudge. Too often she becomes one.

Now obviously she cannot be paid what the specialist in each one of these departments is paid for her part time at each specialty. Often unskilled in most of these tasks to start with, she rarely becomes more skilled as fatigue and discouragement sap her strength. How then shall we compute her value as a worker?

There are some people who believe that Sally should be paid a wage. This involves standardization of wage rates in the home by taking that trade or occupation out into the open field of competition, as has been done for the engineer, statistician, garment worker, lawyer, and architect. If Sally wished to work as employee in her own home, she might demand the same wage that she could get if she went out to direct someone else's home and children. Thus she could approximate a standard wage for such service. She might feel she had more ability than her own home direction exacted and still want to stick to the profession of home making. She could then take a more responsible position and in turn hire some one else for less money to direct her smaller establishment. (The woman who works at another profession outside the home already does this.) Just as the expert gardener in our village of Croton hires himself out as extra at seventy-five cents an hour and pays a less skilled and younger man forty cents an hour to tend his own garden. Just as the expert income tax lawyer may turn over to a subordinate in his office the fathoming of his own income tax report, while he concerns himself with the larger incomes of big fee-paying clients.

This is the way one experiment might go. But it is possible that, having standardized the occupation to a high rate of pay, even should the housekeeper desire to return to direct her own and her husband's home, her husband's income would not permit her employment in their home. Her return home would penalize her. And, working for her husband below the wage she herself has helped to standardize, she destroys her own gain and that to all housekeepers, just as any union worker does.

This proposed solution fails to enlighten me. To pass from total slavery to partial slavery and become an employee is a gain, but it is not enough.

Personally, I want to see the business of home making recognized as a joint, cooperative enterprise directed by the two people who make that home, the husband and wife. Man brings to the home money capital, which he earns out side the home. Woman brings labor-capital, which she contributes to the home. They mutually support each other. Man may earn his money in steel and spend those earnings developing oil. Or man may take his earnings in steel, whether through the pay envelope or the coupon, to invest in the development of the home. It is said that woman is not entitled to share in the financial profits of the home investment as well as in the spiritual because she does not bring in original money-capital. So conceived the home is the only business where each partner is required to furnish original money-capital at the start. Not counting for the moment the value of the enthusiasm put into chosen tasks done for people you love, will any one deny that the labor woman performs in the home is equivalent to money? This is apparent the moment the wife's labor is withdrawn and man has to call upon outside labor.

Many a man who directs every detail of his own company has passed his profits in that company to the hands of others in a totally alien company. The dry-goods merchant invests his earnings in mines. He trusts the responsible heads and engineers in the latter company. So must he do in the home. He must trust the spouse to do her job until she fails, as she may, just as the experts in the mines may fail. He cannot do both jobs himself.

Money-capital and labor-capital should be pooled in developing the home. If all the man's earnings, or whatever share of his earnings, are put into the home, all expenses of husband, wife, and children should have first claim. Then the surplus might be divided as profits are divided by partners, upon a basis of division satisfactory to both. Each spouse's share, no matter how small, would be each one's exclusive property, and could be saved or spent at choice. If such a plan were accepted one spouse might be prodigal, the other thrifty, but each would be responsible for his or her own acts during the union, and would face the consequences if the partnership were dissolved. Or the surplus might be carried by the partnership for the oncoming baby or the contemplated better housing quarters. Or there might be no surplus whatsoever. But there would be the residue of greater mutual confidence and mutual hope and increasing self-respect in their relations.

I propose a flexible contract of mutual support to be drawn at marriage, and frequently redrawn if desired; a contract recognized by law as binding on the two partners jointly, enforceable against each when broken by either without good cause. Such a contract ought not stipulate length of marriage, as that period is incalculable and such a provision would be anti-social. It must stress the mutuality of support.

Then if dissolution came, we would not see men retreating from continent to continent to avoid alimony, for such a contract, if properly carried out, should gradually supplant alimony. Nor would we see the spectacle of women digging shamefully, through fear of insecurity and sometimes revenge, for the last available dollar. Such conduct is humiliating to both parties and is a deep reflection on the haphazard financial arrangements in marriage. Alimony to the wife without children is often a penalty for unpaid back surplus. And it is as difficult to collect as is any old, long-standing, forgotten debt. And to pay it only when that particular partner no longer labors in the home is too ludicrous.

Difficulties over the division of jointly acquired properties would be avoided by the "divide-as-you-go" policy. Where there are children their expenses would still be borne jointly by the parents after they had separated. The system now works out variously. Woman in the main continues to supply the labor or supervision of labor, man the money, where the woman is without money of her own. That is another problem. But one thing is certain. We shall see no abolition of alimony and the wardship it implies until some better and wiser financial cooperation is practiced among the married. It is lamentable to hear men whine about alimony who refused their wives a share of the family income during the partnership.

The women of the economically more fortunate classes have lightened their tasks by employing domestic service. In no considerable numbers have they become partners of their husbands in the business of home-making. Recently a case came to my attention which was more than poignant. Two young people started their married life poor. The husband became a business success and acquired a moderate fortune. At the end of eleven years, during which time the wife had managed an ever-expanding household and had nursed and reared four children, the husband fell in love with another woman. I am not censuring the husband for this. Doubtless he would have avoided it if possible. The husband asked for a divorce. The wife consented to give it to him. At the end of their marriage the wife had not one cent in her possession, not one share of stock, not one bond, no security of any sort, and she was in middle life and untrained. She was obliged to take what was given her to support herself and her children. Had she been a real partner, had she shared the prosperity as well as the early denials, she would have had money security, and would have been spared the humiliation of a dole, given at a time when the giver was no longer in a mood to give and when she undoubtedly shrank from taking.

What is the result when two married people do not share their income? Uncertainties always produce unwarranted fears which lead to extremes. There are plenty of examples where the wife, ignorant of the state of the husband's financial affairs, becomes lavish, prodigal, wasteful. There are more who become bores through constant acts of unnecessary parsimony and self-denial. Both are unbeautiful and not likely to produce peace and happiness in the home. As a general rule men and women cannot live happily in prolonged personal uncertainty. How long would one business man endure an arrangement with a partner if accurate information of the state of the treasury were continually withheld from him by the latter, or if the latter falsified as to the surplus profits?

Non-recognition of the woman as a partner in the home is disastrous in another way. It is subtly pernicious where woman carries her work into the open fields of social competition. She carries with her the psychology of the unpaid work she left behind. So grateful is she to be paid at all that she accepts wages far too low. Unpaid work in the home affects her attitude as well as man's toward her fees in any occupation she undertakes.

In conclusion I would propose the following experiments:

1. Let both men and women look upon woman's work in the home as work with money value. Let them begin by demanding that the United States Government Census list women in the home as gainfully employed, rather than unemployed as it now does.

2. Recognize that the home is a cooperative institution with two joint directors.

3. Pool money-capital and labor-capital and decide in each case what division shall be made of surplus no matter how small.

4. Let those who wish make a contract of mutual support, to be satisfactory to both parties, and to be redrawn as often as desired, although making no provision for the end of the marriage. Let such contract stand in the law, with redress available in the courts, when the contract is broken without mutual consent or without good cause. No one would be compelled to make such a contract. Nor would it eliminate divorce. There would still be marital difficulties. It would merely safeguard the financial security of women who work in the home. If the woman chooses to earn outside the home, a contract might provide for the pooling of all or part of the joint income, instead of the pooling of the wife's labor and the husband's money. Where she contributes both money and labor the contract would embrace still other provisions.

The essence of this proposal is that any such contract shall not be prescribed or limited by law, but that when made it shall be legal between husband and wife.

More responsibility of the right sort will see fewer slatterns among women. More sharing by men will see fewer arrogant and privileged males. Men of imagination will see the danger of their privilege—and women, too, where the privilege is theirs—and will work to abolish it.

The Man Who Threw the Tariff Bomb

By SILAS BENT

HOW long will it take Mr. Coolidge to find an excuse for firing Edward P. Costigan from the Tariff Commission? He, the sole survivor of those who voted for a reduction in the rate on sugar, is in direct line for the presidential ax. But his twelve-year term still has four years to run, and he cannot be supplanted, as David J. Lewis was, nor maneuvered to a diplomatic post three thousand miles away, as William S. Culbertson was. Some other method must be found; for, so long as he remains on deck, the Tariff Commission will never be safe for plutocracy.

However soon Mr. Costigan is beheaded, it will be too late. The fat's in the fire. The Tariff Commission is about to be investigated. And the revelations, so Senator Norris told his colleagues the other day, "will shock the conscience of the country." To hold Mr. Costigan solely responsible for this situation would be inaccurate; yet it came along with its nose right at the heels of some things he said in New York, in concluding his discussion of another man's speech. That the record may be clear, I will quote what he said:

1. Within the last year the United States Tariff Commission, taken as a whole, has ceased to represent disinterested and nonpartisan independence.

2. A serious obstacle to the consideration and correction of the commission's problems is due to the fact that the public has been denied access to a number of the commission's most important reports and findings; and that it has therefore not been possible for the public to be properly informed about the commission's work.

3. A congressional investigation of the activities of the Tariff Commission under the flexible provisions would appear to be an indispensable forerunner of any legislative correction of the present little-understood and regrettable situation.

4. Pending such investigation, confirmation by the Senate of the United States of new appointees to the Tariff Commission—including Commissioners Brossard and Baldwin—should be postponed.

5. Until adequate assurances are given that the membership of the Tariff Commission will be safeguarded by law and will conform to the standards of disinterested public service, it is fair to ask that no further appropriation for the commission's work be authorized by Congress.

Now, the Commissioner was telling no secrets out of school. Everything he said, except possibly his quixotic suggestion that the pay roll be suspended, has been said publicly before; and even the pay roll expedient was tried on one occasion. That was when Commissioner Henry H. Glassie, admitting that his family owned a sugar plantation and mill, insisted on sitting in the sugar hearings until a special bill was passed by Congress, severing him from the Treasury until that case should be completed, and thus effectually terminating his services for the time being. There was no news in Mr. Costigan's speech except that a tariff commissioner made it, and only one newspaper gave it conspicuous space. Yet see what happened.

First, the speech was read into the Congressional Record.

Second, Senator King of Utah introduced a resolution calling for an investigation by a special committee of five.

Third, Senator Smoot of Utah countered with a resolution calling for an investigation by the Finance Committee, of which he is chairman.

Fourth, Commissioner Dennis issued a statement saying that the trouble with the Tariff Commission lay with the Harding, not the Coolidge, appointees. He is a Coolidge appointee.

Fifth, Commissioner Glassie said Mr. Dennis's statements were false and misleading. He is a Harding appointee.

Senator Smoot's resolution was admirable in that it manifested a chilled-steel nerve. The Senator owns 400 shares of the Utah-Idaho (beet) Sugar Company, which is a large beneficiary under the tariff; he is one of the twelve apostles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which as trustee controls that company; and Commissioner Brössard, whose appointment by President Coolidge will be one of the focal points of the investigation, is a Mormon and the Senator's handy man on the commission. His proposal that the Finance Committee investigate the Tariff Commission was clearly a proposal that he be permitted, please, to investigate himself.

For the investigation, if it is complete, will not deal alone with such comparatively recent happenings as President Coolidge's suppression of the sugar and other reports; his refusal (at a cost of $200,000 a day to American sugar consumers) to lower the sugar tariff; his appointment of Edgar B. Brossard to succeed Mr. Culbertson, and of A. H. Baldwin to succeed William Burgess, who resigned on account of ill health; nor even his reasons for trying, with Senator Smoot's connivance, to make "Beet Sugar Charlie" Warren the Attorney General of this United States. The inquiry may go all the way back to 1921, when Senator Smoot told Cubans he would hold the sugar rates open until he heard whether they would be willing to reduce their cane acreage. The scandal of the ensuing wildly speculative market, which cost American consumers millions of dollars, has not yet been fully aired. The investigation might even bring out the Senator's use of statistics and statements prepared by Truman G. Palmer, long a lobbyist for the beet-sugar interests.

No, it is safe to say that Mr. Costigan did not have Senator Smoot's committee in mind when he called for an investigation. It is equally safe to say that he did not foresee the train of events which was to follow his speech. Certainly he could not foresee that Commissioner Dennis, while he and Commissioner Glassie were calling one another hard names, would be jockeyed into supporting the demand for an investigation.

Mr. Dennis is in an embarrassing position. He is a protege of Secretary Hoover and a personal friend of President Coolidge, about whom he has written laudatory campaign articles; but he is also a Democrat, a moderate protectionist, and a little thin-skinned. It is "a bit discouraging," he admits, to find himself always in the minority when rates should be reduced. The law required that a Democrat be chosen to supplant Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Dennis apparently feels that the Administration, in choosing him, regarded him as "safe."

Nobody has ever thought Edward P. Costigan safe in that sense. If he had said to himself when he took his degree at Harvard: I am now going to behave in such a way that never, during the next quarter of a century, or the quarter century after that if I live so long, in my goings out and comings in, in my utterances and in my friendships, never shall it be said that I am safe for the spoils system; if he had made some such resolve his whole life since that day would have been a post-graduate proof of it. To be unsafe for the spoils system it is not enough to let the system severely alone; one must be an enemy of it, one must move actively in the ranks against it. And that is what Mr. Costigan has been and done.

Mr. Costigan was admitted to the bar in Senator Smoot's Salt Lake City, but he began practicing at the beginning of the century in Denver, and has lived there ever since. He ran as a Republican for the Colorado House of Representatives, and on a contest was declared elected but was not seated. After this little lesson in politics he helped organize the Honest Election League; and since then he has been helpful in various such movements: a Direct Primary League and Direct Legislation League, civil-service reform and a municipal reform campaign; and in 1912 he helped organize the Progressive Party in Colorado. Twice he was the unsuccessful Progressive candidate for Governor. He has been an advocate of conservation, temperance legislation, equal suffrage, municipal ownership of public utilities, the initiative, referendum, and recall—that sort of thing. As an attorney he has appeared for mine workers and for strikers charged with murder, who were acquitted.

One of the things Mr. Costigan was plugging for was tariff reform; and when, in 1916, he saw that the Democrats at Washington were headed in that direction, he publicly urged—not as a Democrat, nor as a Republican, but in his capacity as a Progressive—that the Democratic ticket be supported. Mr. Wilson was reelected, you recall, in the West.

At Harvard Mr. Costigan had been a pupil of Dr. F. W. Taussig, who became the first chairman of the Tariff Commission created during the Wilson Administration; and the pupil now became one of the first tariff commissioners. At that time the commission was a fact-finding agency, without the quasi-judicial character which it acquired under the "flexible" provisions of the 1922 act. The two men worked together until 1919, when Dr. Taussig resigned. They came together again at the recent meeting in New York of the American Economic Association, where Mr. Costigan, commenting on Dr. Taussig's speech, let fall those five sticks of dynamite which have been set forth here.

Although Dr. Taussig and Mr. Costigan agree that the Tariff Commission, as now constituted, cannot command public respect, they disagree radically on an important point: Dr. Taussig thinks that the interests involved in tariff-making are so powerful, and can bring to bear such influence through the party in power, that we can never have disinterested and unpartisan administration of the "flexible" clause; Mr. Costigan believes that once the light is let in, we can. Dr. Taussig is pessimistic; Mr. Costigan has a larger faith in his fellows. It is that faith, I feel sure, which has kept him at his post ever since 1917, so that he is now the only "charter member" still serving; it is that faith which prompts his demand for an investigation, so the commission may not be undone in the dark. Never until Mr. Glassie insisted on sitting in the sugar case was it supposed that an interested commissioner might participate in such a judicial proceeding. Evidently Mr. Costigan believes that there can be a return to the earlier conditions.

It is refreshing to encounter a faith which persists through all that has happened in the Tariff Commission since the sugar investigation began. The mere matter of cotton hosiery, which has been on the commission tapis these thirty months, would wear down most men's optimism. The pocket veto by Mr. Coolidge of important reports, so that the public has no ground of information for judging the arbitrary rulings at the White House, might well cool any one's ardor.

But softly! Let it be said in justice to Mr. Coolidge that he has reduced the duties on bran and live bobwhite quail. Yes, after questioning the leading ornithologists of the United States; after making a laborious investigation covering five months and extending into New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Illinois, Kansas, Texas, and Mississippi; after procuring the "costs of production" of live bobwhite quail covering 100 per cent of those brought into the United States in 1925, and 95 per cent in 1924, from Mexico, "the principal competing country"; and after analyzing expertly the weighted average costs, the commission reported in favor of a reduction; and the President, seeing his duty clearly, issued a ringing proclamation, lowering the rate to the full extent of his authority under the law.

At the end of the document containing this momentous report and proclamation I find a note: "Commissioner Costigan did not participate in the above report of the commission." It is the first from which he has withheld himself and it was his first chance, under Mr. Coolidge, to experience the sensation of participating in a "revision downward." But Commissioner Costigan had no time for clowning. He was meditating dynamite.

No, when the presidential ax falls, if it does, the Costigan slate will be clean; he will still be rated among the enemies of the spoils system.

John Garibaldi Speaks

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, D. C., January 16

LAST winter when John Garibaldi Sargent arrived in Washington to become Attorney General of the United States the good Calvin, then somewhat perturbed in spirit, sent a trusted messenger to meet his old Vermont friend at the station and bring him to the White House. The messenger was particularly instructed to see Mr. Sargent before he got off the train and tell him to let the reporters take his picture but to say nothing. So literally did the new Attorney General follow that advice that while he posed until the last photographer was satisfied he could not be got even to say what time he left Ludlow for Washington nor where he intended to spend the night. Since then he has adhered to that advice so closely that, while innumerable pictures have been taken of him for the movies and magazines, if up to ten days ago he had said anything either to newspapermen or anyone else other than "Good morning" and "Colonel Donovan has charge of that" it was said in complete privacy. From time to time a statement in his name has come out of the Department of Justice, but that was not Mr. Sargent speaking—it was the department through its publicity man, who, it is said, does not like to be referred to as a publicity man, though how else to refer to him no one knows. Personally, the Attorney General has carried out White House instructions and literally said nothing.

That was why there was such keen interest in the Senate when, a week ago today, Mr. Sargent took the witness chair before the senatorial committee investigating the aluminum case. It was his first public appearance, the first chance to hear him speak for himself, actually the first time some of the Senators who voted for his confirmation had ever seen him. It was not the fault of the Washington correspondents that the impression made by his testimony was inadequately transmitted through the newspapers. The fact is it could not be done that way. It had to be heard to be really appreciated. Merely reading about it means missing its full significance. However, after three hours of examination it was the unanimous verdict among those who listened that Mr. Coolidge's Attorney General was perhaps the most remarkable witness who ever appeared before a Senate committee—remarkable not in what he knew but in what he did not know. At the end of the hearing a Republican Senator, who had sat amazed through the morning, said, "Incredible as it seems, the Attorney General knows less about the Department of Justice than Denby did about the Navy."

To some who did not hear but read what the Attorney General said, searching for some explanation of his unbelievable lack of knowledge, the idea occurs that perhaps Mr. Sargent is really a superb actor, far deeper than is believed, and his replies to questions were for the purpose of cannily concealing knowledge rather than naively revealing his lack of it. It is perhaps natural that such a notion should arise, but no one who heard him entertains it. Unanimously they acquit the Attorney General of either guile or subtlety. Unanimously they would agree that he was, before this committee, himself. It was impossible to listen to him and doubt it.

Since Mr. Sargent took hold ten months ago there have been two views of him here. One was that he had no real grasp on his job and did not pretend to have, that Donovan, one assistant, ran the legal end and Marshall, the other assistant, the political end, and that all Mr. Sargent did was to look ponderously wise and sign where he was told to sign. The other view was that he was a shrewd old fellow with real ability and resourcefulness back of his silence, that he kept personally posted on all important matters under him, and did the real directing, holding a tight rein over Donovan.

What Mr. Sargent did in his first public appearance was to prove completely the first estimate which completely disproves the second. He was, it is true, an evasive witness—evasive through no desire to conceal the facts or any effort to mislead the committee, but simply because he did not know. The things he did not know were amazing in an Attorney General. It was not only the law with which he was admittedly unfamiliar but the facts. He had not heard of the resolution of the Federal Trade Commission refusing to give the aluminum evidence to his department. He did not know of the letter of his predecessor, Mr. Stone, stating that it was apparent the company had violated the law. He was unaware of any controversy over the aluminum company until a newspaperman mentioned it to him. He had not heard of the aluminum company at all before he came to Washington. He had no recollection that he had ever taken any personal action in the aluminum case, as those things were in Mr. Donovan's hands. The following day he corrected this and said his attention had been called to a memorandum he had signed soon after he took office requesting Mr. Donovan to investigate the case and report to him. He must, he said, have done this, because the signature to the memorandum is his, but he had no recollection of it.

The most persistent questions showed that there was nothing from start to finish that Mr. Sargent knew about the case, almost nothing he had ever heard about it. It was so apparent that this was so that no one who heard him had the least thought he was holding anything back, although as a witness it was impossible to pin him down. Quite evidently he thought the thing to do above all else was to avoid answering any question yes or no. Not once in three hours did he use either of those words—even when they would have been the easiest way out for him. He spoke so slowly that often a Senator would ask him a second question under the impression that he had finished his reply, only to have the Attorney General continue calmly to explain that on this point he had no definite knowledge or was not clear in his mind or had not reached a conclusion or was not familiar with the facts.

It not only took him a long time to say these things but he said them in so many ways that there was always the expectation that he might get somewhere—but he never did. Every word was said ponderously, slowly, impressively, solemnly. His long pauses made it seem as if he were giving his replies the deepest thought, but when they came it was revealed they were nothing to think about. To the end he maintained his poise. Admissions that brought a smile to every face in the room left him unperturbed. Dignified and ponderous, a mountain of a man, with a heavy face and a kindly eye, John Garibaldi left the witness chair after having demonstrated beyond doubt that no man who ever held his great office knew less about it than he. The curious mixture of serenity and stolidity in the Sargent character blinded him to this, and, incredible as it seems, he stepped down with the satisfied air of one who has confounded his critics and acquitted himself well.

Beyond doubt he made a deep impression, but not the one he seemed to think. While those who heard him certainly acquitted him of any sinister purpose and held him guiltless of guile, they were also in complete accord in regarding his reputation as a shrewd, resourceful, capable person as without foundation. That he is a nice old man nearly everybody would agree, but that he is an Attorney General is right hard to maintain after last week.

It does look as if following the Senate's rejection of Mr. Warren last year Mr. Coolidge played one of the greatest jokes on that body ever perpetrated by a President when he got them to confirm Mr. Sargent sight unseen. The fact that Mr. Coolidge did not do it as a joke is the most pregnant fact of all.

In the Driftway

SO Charlie Schwab has let the cat out of the bag again! Of all the captains of industry that the Drifter has known—and he doesn't pretend to know many—Charlie Schwab is the most likable because he is so absolutely frank, gives himself no airs, pretends to no particular wisdom, and is utterly unlike the sententious, all-knowing, and divinely prophetic Elbert H. Gary, the best-paid advance agent of prosperity. Schwab is just a good-natured grown-up boy and in Chicago the other night he admitted frankly that somebody else writes his speeches for him. "You know," he said to the American Road Builders Association, "there is a fellow down at New York who writes my speeches for me. He has written one for me to deliver to you. It has been given to all the newspapers and you can read it in the morning, but I am going to talk about something else." And talk about something else he did. The dispatches don't say what, but the Drifter guarantees that it was bright and racy and altogether human and much more worth reading than the speech that fellow back in New York had written for him.

* * * * *

THE charming thing about Charlie Schwab is his spontaneity as well as his frankness. The Drifter remembers with joy how on one occasion at Loretto, where the head of the Bethlehem Steel has built himself a very impressive country house with a big terrace, there was an afternoon tea going on to which all the neighborhood was invited, among them many of the Catholic friends of the host. Charlie has built a church, at least part of a convent, and other things there to help him in the future life. Noticing that the host was in mellow spirits and happy as he never fails to be when friends and neighbors are about him, one of the dignitaries of the convent decided that the time was ripe to ask him for another $50,000 for that institution. He flashed back at her that she could have the $50,000 if then and there on the terrace she would dance with him to the music of the band. She accepted, to the amazement of the neighbors, danced a step or two with him, and went off with a check. The Drifter is certain that she got absolution for her sin; there is only one thing that puzzles him: How did she happen to know how to dance? Is it possible that—but, no, the Drifter forbears.

CHARLIE SCHWAB has danced on other occasions. He has seen much of the world and is not unfamiliar with its weaknesses and follies, and his fondness for poker which he can so well indulge is notorious. But he loves the simple life in Bethlehem where the neighbors drop in on him of an evening, in contrast to the lonely grandeur of his Riverside Drive mansion where people don't have the habit of calling informally to talk over the neighborhood news. But best of all, the Drifter thinks, Charlie Schwab loves a blast furnace. In fact the Drifter once heard him say that as between a $150,000 painting by an Italian master and a blast furnace he preferred the latter because he got more fun out of it. The Drifter understood perfectly what he meant. He was not sneering at the old master or showing a lack of appreciation of art. It was a frank admission that the tremendous human and mechanical problems which a blast furnace offers stir him as nothing else could. He was not once a workman for nothing; he can look into the future, too, and when he stands by a blast furnace he sees many things in the flames visible at the furnace doors or issuing from the top of the stacks. His men like him because they know he was once one of them and because, whatever his faults, he is so human and so without affectation or pretense. The Drifter is sure that that speech-writing fellow upon whom Charlie Schwab peached does not bear him any ill-will at all—few could, and among them is not

THE DRIFTER

P. S. Later. Charlie now says it was all a joke—a joke perhaps on the many from the President down who do have their liter'ry fellers to supply golden words and copper-fastened thoughts.

Correspondence

Never Satisfied

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There is no pacifying the pacifists. Our preparations are damned if they do and double-damned if they don't.

The Nation complains because, in the late lamented war, we spent a billion dollars on airplanes and have nothing to show for it. If we actually had a billion dollars' worth of airplanes, we would be the nightmare of the world.

Let us hope that our wars will never be carried on by deadly earnest pacifists who demand one hundred cents of result for every dollar of expenditure. Meanwhile giving thanks for our lackadaisical militarists,

The Sins of Sinclair

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I note in Mr. Benjamin Stolberg's review of Miss Ida Tarbell's "History of the Standard Oil Company," new edition, that "Miss Tarbell's research, unlike Upton Sinclair's recent performance, is as hole-proof as it is fool-proof."

It has apparently not occurred to Mr. Stolberg to go back and consult the reviews of Miss Tarbell's book when it was first published. He would find that it was not entirely hole-proof, and certainly not in any way fool-proof. Neither was it rogue-proof.

As for Upton Sinclair: in the course of his conflict with lawless wealth, he has stated some hundreds of thousands of facts, and a dozen or so have been incorrect; but there is this to be said for him: he has stuck by his guns, and you do not find him fawning upon those whom formerly he lashed.

Miss Tarbell has just published a fulsome biography of Judge Gary; and the sins of old Rockefeller against freedom of trade were white as snow compared to the sins of Judge Gary against labor and against the fundamental rights of citizenship in his great steel empire. When I read the first reviews of this new book I said to myself: "There is only one thing left to complete the career of Ida Tarbell, and that is for her to write a third volume, whitewashing the Rockefellerers." Now I learn from Mr. Stolberg's review that this third volume is actually in preparation.

UPTON SINCLAIR

Conservative New Zealand!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: We have just had an election and it has resulted in the Government Party obtaining 55 seats, a gain of 15 seats; the National Party (formerly called Liberals) obtaining 10 seats, a loss of 11; Labor obtaining 13, a loss of 4. The great government victory was due to the absolute weakness of the Nationalists and to the fear of communism from the Labor Party. The British seamen's strike completely spoiled any chances that Labor might have had.

The tendency toward conservatism as against legislative and political experiment seems to be of world-wide character.

Auckland, New Zealand, November 14 J. D. ROBERTSON

A National Park in the East

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: History will record no more striking fact than the early establishment of vast national parks in the younger and little-settled Western regions of our country and the failure to establish during the same era parks of similar kind and of adequate area in the older and more densely populated Eastern sections. There are eight square miles of national-park area east of the Mississippi—in Maine. West of the Mississippi there are more than 11,000 square miles.

Evidently it was not through sectional favoritism on the part of the government that vast national parks were established in the West, because these parks were given to the government. Certainly cheapness of land did not determine the distribution, because cheap land of great scenic value has been available always in the East. Mere height of mountain relief or length of mountain ranges could not have determined the Western predominance, because the East has possessed the lofty Great Smoky Mountains of Tennessee and of Virginia and the long ranges of the Appalachians, including the Blue Ridge. The novelty of the canyons, sentinel peaks, deserts, glaciers, craters, great trees, cataracts, and forests as they appeared to the eyes of the pioneers of the West was, of course, the compelling fact which led to the enthusiastic creation of the great national parks. To the Western Indians, who were accustomed to these spectacles, the scenery of the East appeared novel.

Today the sons of the Western pioneers are finding Eastern scenery interesting in the highest degree. These men, when they journey toward the Atlantic in search of recreation, are making as it were a rediscovery of the rivers, lakes, the mountains, and the virgin forests of the East. Although men of the West are impressed with the novelty of the landscapes of the Eastern country and with the scenery of its vastly older mountains, the present movement to create new national parks in the East is not led by these Western men whose eyes and appreciation ought to be the keenest but by the men who live in the regions whose acquisition is contemplated. This awakening has been brought about by familiarity, through travel, with the national parks of the West and with the scenery of the country as a whole.

This perception of itself might lead only to a complacency regarding the scenic resources of the East were it not for pressing economic demands which are being made upon the States which possess such scenery. The demand for timber is threatening to despoil this region of the virgin forests which are singular to it and alone remain of all those which covered the Eastern mountains when our country was settled. Action is needed to save these primeval woodlands and the scenery to which they are essential.

Who are these men and what are the lands and the scenery which they wish to save for national use and enjoyment? The men and the lands are of Tennessee, North Carolina, and Virginia, where the Great Smoky and the Blue Ridge mountains rise up to form the most impressive mountain scenery east of the Mississippi. These men are trying to raise money sufficient to purchase the highest mountain ranges and their forest cover and dedicate these lands and their landscapes to the recreative enjoyment and to the education of all the people of the country. Congress has appointed a commission to view these lands to see if they are worthy in distinction and in size to become national parks. The commission after a thorough field study has reported enthusiastically for their acquisition.

The great need of the moment is to inform the nation East and West of the unselfish work which the men of Tennessee, North Carolina, and Virginia are doing to acquire these lands. If the people of the country are fully informed, there can be no doubt of the ultimate success of the efforts to secure an Eastern national park commensurate in size, distinction, and recreational and educational value with those west of the Mississippi.

Eton, a School for "Poor Boys"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of the exclusion of Countess Karolyi you advance (in your issue of December 2) the case of Antioch College and its exclusion of a Negro boy fully qualified to enter that institution founded to "stand always a place where neither sex, color, nor creed shall ever bar young people from an education."

Few people are aware that there are a score of great endowments in England which are handled in a precisely similar manner. The most notorious instance is Eton College, founded by some grateful native of long ago. The official title of this institution is "the Free Grammar School of Eton founded for the free education of the poor boys of Eton forever." Today it is the premier school for sons of the aristocracy. For over a century there has never been in the school a single poor-boy inhabitant of Eton. The income of the foundation is large and the trustees have from time to time obtained control of all the real estate in the parish of Eton which, through prevention of building and razing of old houses, today is a small and thinly populated area, apart from the school buildings. Within that area only traders are permitted to establish themselves. They make a good living out of supplying the needs of the 1,100 boys (whose expenditure averages $1,500 per head annually) and the faculty and numerous officials connected with the institution and otherwise.

If a resident desires to send his son to the school his right is not disputed, but his business is placed "out of bounds," which means that any student entering it risks expulsion from the school. There is no difficulty in enforcing the regulation because English people are particularly loyal to established authorities and the headmaster's fiat is law and so recognized by the courts and the government. Thus commercial ruin is the cost of availing oneself of one's right to send a child to the school provided for the purpose. The authorities of Antioch are amply supported by English precedents if they desire to avoid the intentions of the founder of the college.

The New Newark Museum

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Three months from now the Newark Museum Association will open to the public its new museum. When the museum opens it will, in addition to its regular collections of art, science, and industry, display for the first time an important collection of works by living American artists purchased this year. The museum is definitely following a policy of encouraging the arts in America by purchasing the works of living American artists and designers. The museum will stress from the beginning the importance of the arts of everyday life, in furniture and household utensils, in house decoration, in personal ornament, in clothing, not only as a necessary foundation for the growth of the fine arts, painting, sculpture, etc., but as ends in themselves.

The museum will emphasize also service to the public. It lends works of art, reproductions, and various forms of exhibit material to schools, stores, workshops, factories, and to individuals. Through its lending collections and its children's museum the Newark Museum before it moved into its new home was sending out over 2,000 exhibits each month to the public.

Agreement in Brazil

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The leaders of the two great political parties in Brazil, of the "Ins" and "Outs," have wisely united in nominating Dr. Washington Linz for the presidency and Dr. Fernando de Mello Vianna for the vice-presidency of the United States of Brazil. This is automatically equivalent to an election, which formally will take place, in a simplified form, next March. The new administration will take charge in September.

This movement and its results are encouraging. Mr. Washington Linz, the present governor of the important coffee state of Sao Paulo, is a very able and highly esteemed statesman. Mr. Mello Vianna, governor of the important state of Minas Geraes, is equally well known and has also rendered important political services. With this political combination an era of good feeling is probably reentered after the disagreements which led, two years ago, to the outbreak of the so-called Sao Paulo revolution.

No little praise is due to the patriotic energy of the present president of Brazil, Dr. Bernardes, who courageously took charge of the government during a very dangerous crisis and introduced important and urgently necessary reforms.

What art can wash away his folly?
What charm can make him clean again?

The only art to seek salvation,
To win forgiveness from each eye,
To gain approval from The Nation,

First Glance

MRS. FLORENCE AYSCOUGH'S "A Chinese Mirror" (Houghton Mifflin: $5) is not, as its title might indicate, a series of impressions. Or if it is impressions that we get, they are a great deal more than reflections from the surface. As Mrs. Ayscough explains in her preface, a Chinese mirror is expected to yield the reality rather than the appearance of a thing; and so she has tried in each of her chapters to give us the whole meaning of a Chinese thing. The result is a book which will not be easy to read, for it is learned and detailed. Mrs. Ayscough has spent a quarter of a century in the country she writes about, and for the purposes of her present study she has plundered not only the Chinese classics but the researches of many sinologues in Europe and America. But it may be well to have a book on China which cannot be read by one who runs. China has not run—at least till now—for something like four thousand years, and during that time, since she is a brilliantly gifted nation, she has accumulated an immeasurable stock of stories, beliefs, and arts. It is at this stock that Mrs. Ayscough's fascinating book teaches us to look with a more or less expert eye.

Her procedure is both less orderly and more profitable than that of one who writes guide-books or relies on impressions. Knowing and remembering so much, she is forced to settle upon some institution or place and collect her data about that—reaching always further and deeper until it seems to her that she has written enough. About the story of the building of her own house at Shanghai, for instance, she gathers eighty pages of information, always informally conveyed, concerning the popular life of China today. In three chapters called Symbolism of the Purple Forbidden City, T'ai Shan: The Great Mountain, and Cult of the Spiritual Magistrates of City Walls and City Moats she intrepidly explores the all but impossible realm of Chinese religious philosophy. And in a chapter on The Chinese Idea of a Garden—which is "that it shall represent as closely as possible the innumerable natural scenes so dear to the heart of a scholar"—she lights up the spirit of this paragon more richly than I have ever seen it lighted up before. The seven fine arts which among other things the scholar must master are, one may repeat in passing, "calligraphy, painting, playing the table-lute, playing hedged-in-checkers, writing poems, drinking wine, and cultivating flowers."

But the triumph of Mrs. Ayscough's book is the chapter called The Literary Background of the Great River. "I have heard a tale," she says, "of a Japanese professor who went up the river in order to lecture. . . . The learned man arrived in a state of exhaustion, having, in his desire to identify the famous sites on either shore, barely slept or eaten on the way." Compared with the Yangtze, of course, the Rhine, the Danube, the Hudson, the Seine, the Thames, and the Tiber are newcomers; for every foot of The River is colored by a legend or remembered by a poem. Tu Fu and Li Po lived on its banks; and at P'êng Tsê another poet, T'ao Whirlpool-of-Intelligence, served for a few weeks as an official—or, as he put it himself, "crooked the loins for the sake of five measures of rice." Mrs. Ayscough went in a boat the 2,700 miles from Shanghai through the Three Chasms to Chungking and back, and her account of the expedition, packed as it is with reminiscences of lovers and scholars and soldiers and painters and poets, is one of the most moving narratives I know. This Side of Love Beyond Hatred. The Democratic Ideal in France and America.

By Albert Leon Guérard. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

MR. GUERARD writes brilliantly. His pages sparkle with anecdotes, allusions, and shrewd characterizations often amusing, seldom trite, and always apt. No reader who gets well started with "Beyond Hatred" will be likely to leave the book long until he has finished it, and by the time he has reached the end he will probably have chuckled enough to add appreciably to his normal expectation of life. Whether the residuary effect of the book will be equally inspiring, however, is another matter. Mr. Guérard follows a method which, in less clever hands, would seem to court disaster. He begins by exposing, in a masterly fashion, the weaknesses and absurdities of what passes for political democracy in France and America, and wields the knife so skilfully and remorselessly as to make political despotism seem attractive by comparison. To think of millions of immortal souls passing a ghastly eternity amid such contradictions and specious pretenses as are here depicted recalls the story of Machiavelli, who is said to have remarked, after a horrid dream in which processions of saints and sinners had deployed before him, that he would rather live in hell and discuss serious matters with the philosophers and heroes whom the church had banned than associate in heaven with the godly rabble that had just passed. Then, having demonstrated what a mess political democracy and civilization have made of things, Mr. Guérard pleads with the peoples to love each other as brethren and grow in grace through the unction of an international spirit. We are, apparently, in our several national ways, fools all, but if only we will forget the turmoil and the stench, put our arms about our neighbors' necks, and march cheerily onward to the tune of "God bless the human race!" the Promised Land shall be ours to enter and possess.

How, by so bewildering a route, the goal of an internationalized humanity is to be attained Mr. Guérard hastens to tell us even while the dissection proceeds. Some of the things that offend us most in democratic institutions are really not as bad as they seem; they may even be occasions for rejoicing if only we would understand them better. Political democracy, for example, is in reality a hybrid affair in which vestigial remains of the glorious but benighted days of kings stiek out obtrusively in the mass of other functions belonging to the worthier days of the people. Clemenceau named the prostate gland and the presidency of the French Republic as the two things in the world for which he had never been able to see any use, but since democratic France insists upon having a figurehead, Mr. Guérard suggests that it might be well to have an emperor, a king, and a president, the first to entertain visiting emperors and such, the second to grace the funeral of M. Charles Maurras, and the third to attend the divorce of M. Herriot. Similarly, instead of Americans having only one flag to cheer for, let us have two, the Stars and Stripes for the democracy of Lincoln and a Dollar flag for dollar diplomacy. Some such practical adjustments as these would tide over the interval until internationalism arrives.

Mr. Guérard is at pains to insist that democracy does not mean racial or social equality, but although Negroes and whites in the mass will not mix, the Negro is advancing, as witness the changed relations between the races in the South, and even the black army of France testifies to a belief that racial barriers will not count for much in the international future. A universal language would obviously be better for certain purposes than are the forty-odd tongues with which Europe has to contend, and Mr. Guérard fences deftly with Anatole France over the Master's cynical distrust of Esperanto, but he is not ready to assert that a universal English is part of the price that internationalism must pay. And so and thus with the battle of the classics in France, Voltaire and the "new history," and all the other topics over which the book ranges.

Mr. Guérard's conclusion is as baffling as his main argument, if that may be called argument in which premises and conclusion are not always easily joined. The democracy of Lincoln is not a democracy of equality, but we may nevertheless act "as if" all men were equal. The common foe is "the assumption of unproved superiorities." What matters is only the negative side of social theories; "what is constructive in life can take care of itself without theory." "The root of hatred is not inequality but pride." The sovereign remedy, apparently, is love, and love we must if the world is to be saved. One hesitates to challenge so hopeful a conclusion, but whether the average reader of the book will conclude that love alone will really rid the world of evil, and forthwith begin to practice it upon all mankind, or conclude instead that Mr. Guérard's political philosophy is the more practical one of a cheerful tone and a stiff upper lip, may fairly be regarded as an open question.

Document and More

Black Valley. By Raymond Weaver. The Viking Press. $2.

OF the scores of missionaries who annually sail away to carry the Gospel to foreign lands there are few who realize that it is, fundamentally, not the heathen but their own souls which they are bent upon saving. Some are running away from those complications of life which can be left physically behind, a greater number are in full flight from themselves, but all are driven, however little they may be aware of the fact, by the obscure needs of their own spirit. Men whose craving for power and position can find no adequate satisfaction at home, women who must find an environment where their gnawing shame of spinsterhood may be transformed into the glory of a willing sacrifice to God, and the whole company of those who can achieve no real adjustment at home pack up their Bibles and their belongings for the voyage to a foreign land where they may create for themselves the traditions and the standards which they cannot find in any natural society. Many of them achieve, in a measure at least, the sublimations which they seek, many pass on to their children problems created by their own artificial adjustments; but here and there one is brought by some crisis in his own life to realize the real nature of that impulse to "push the heathen to the wall" which is called in ecclesiastical language "a missionary vocation."

Such, at least, I take to be the underlying thesis of Mr. Weaver's novel, through which run the threads of a double plot—the story of a boy who revolted from the solemn pretentiousness of his father's theology only to fall a victim to the subtler influence of his mother's possessiveness, and the story of a missionary lady of middle age who scandalized the community by announcing her engagement to a sea captain only to realize when he failed to appear on time for the wedding that her love, like her vocation, was merely a phantom generated by an emptiness of the heart which had never been filled. Doubtless Mr. Weaver's novel will be read chiefly for the swift interest of its narrative and the piquancies of its account of the ironies involved in the contacts between the East and that highly specialized portion of the West which is represented by the missionaries; but below this outward investiture lies a psychological study, not without a Freudian significance, whose interpretation is left entirely to the reader. The meaning of the story of the missionary lady is hardly in doubt—she realized in the time given her by the dilatoriness of her prospective husband that only the intensity of her need made him seem a suitable mate and so returned to such consolation as the service of her God could give her—but the story of the boy is left by the irony of the author to be interpreted according to the temperament of the reader. Outwardly the dying mother, who clings to him and who, by the loyalty which she tacitly demands, enables him to extricate himself from the two amorous entanglements into which he falls, is the heroine of the book; and outwardly his old friend Mrs. West, to whom he turns for guidance when his mother is dead, is to become the wise counselor of his young manhood. But there are those who will see, as I fancy that Mr. Weaver saw, another meaning in these events. They will see in that devotion to his mother, abnormally triumphant over passion, the beginning of one of those sinister obsessions which make men missionaries or worse, and they will see in Mrs. West but a substitute embodiment of the mother who is destined always to stand between him and any satisfactory adjustment to life.

It is obvious that Mr. Weaver knows his Japan and it is obvious, too, from his temperate and rounded characterizations of the principal personages concerned, that his attitude toward the missionaries is not that of a fanatic but rather the result of a seasoned and mellowed contempt which is not afraid to give the devil his due and which feels no necessity to overstate the case. His book will serve as an admirable document and as the record of an acute observer, but because it is so much more than merely local and informative it stands out as a novel of insight and power and as one with solid foundations in universal human character. Outwardly it is a story of Japan and a commentary upon the lives and personalities of those who devote themselves to service "in the foreign field"; inwardly it is a story of those frustrations of spirit which are peculiar to no special environment and which differ only in their accidents according to the environment of their victims.

Karel Capek

Krakatit. By Karel Capek. Translated by Lawrence Hyde. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Letters from England. By Karel Capek. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

CAPEK, like many others, is harassed by this age of iron which has made man a slave to the machine. How will the already poignant struggle between man and the machine end? Capek is full of foreboding. Like Bertrand Russell he believes that the future is in the hands of the man who invents the most powerful machine, that the scientist rather than the poet or artist will be the dominating figure of the future.

In his novel "Krakatit" he attacks the imaginative theme of "R. U. R." A scientist has invented an explosive capable of blowing up the whole world in a few minutes. He is captured by emissaries from a foreign kingdom who are determined to buy or steal the secret of Krakatit from him. He refuses; the power to destroy all humanity, put in the hand of a single individual or nation, would be a deadly thing. Sometimes, however, he hesitates and with a philosophy strangely reminiscent of Anatole France in the last chapter of "Penguin Island" wonders if the destruction of humanity is so dreadful after all.

What do I care for the laws of eternity? Your moment will come and you will explode. You may liberate love, pain, thought, I don't know what. You are not part of the endless order, or of the millions of light years. Explode with the most lofty flame. Do you feel yourself shut in? Then burst to pieces the mortar. Make a place for your sole moment. That is good.

There is a slight love episode with the Princess Wilhelmina, a daughter of the royal house in whose kingdom the inventor is captive. Here Capek is like Anthony Hope or Marie Corelli. And, unfortunately, this episode is characteristic of the book. It has fire and color, and yet it never rises above the commonplace. In spite of the quality of the plot and the evident artistic ability of the author the novel is not as a whole interesting; it is dull, and at times it is obscure with the obscurity that comes from a certain mental looseness. Capek does not quite understand everything he himself says. One suspects that, after all, he is a poet who thinks he knows a great deal of science.

The "Letters" record the charming, light impressions of Capek during his recent visit to England. They have all the charm of a witty, clever, cultivated acquaintance who is talking to you of his visit to a strange country and who has an eye for detail, a shrewdness of vision, and an excellent sense of humor. Capek met a great many literary men in England, and he gives them in vivid paragraphs. The illustrations by the author are equal to the prose itself.

MARYA ZATURENSKA

The Unity of Mankind

Social Origins and Social Continuities. By Alfred M. Tozzer. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IN the course of a general discussion of the life and ideas of "primitive man" Mr. Tozzer demonstrates that "man is one and cultures are many" in a fashion that should drive the point finally home.

The first chapter, dealing with methods and theories which have been used in the study of anthropological data, should give the reader a clear idea of that difference between the cultural and the natural backgrounds of man which is so simple to state and apparently so difficult to grasp. The author insists quite rightly that a sharp differentiation should be made between biological and cultural inheritance, and then goes on to explain some of the difficulties which are in the way of accepting this position—for instance, the similarity of cultural phenomena the world over and the questions of psychic unity and diffusion of culture. There is a good critique of the popular contemporary English diffusionist school, and finally a discourse on progress, with the result, as might be expected, that the difficulty of determining criteria looms very large as an obstacle.

Passing on to a consideration of the nature of savage society, Mr. Tozzer discusses some theories regarding the origin of society and surveys some of the causes which go to make up divergences in cultures. Is it race? Or environment? Or perhaps the social background itself? Clearly it is not the first or the second, as is seen after reading the results of all the investigations to date. Man, as Wissler remarked, is a culture-building animal; "man inherits some of the factors necessary to make a pattern—the warp alone is there to hold the fabric together; but the woof, the filling in of the pattern, is a product of man's invention . . . and quite apart from any innate characteristics he may have."

In his presentation of the crises in the life of the individual Mr. Tozzer is committed to an acceptance of van Gennep's theory that the various rites which mark the periods of stress and change in status of an individual's life are really "rites du passage"—attempts to make the going over from one period of life to another less fraught with danger than it otherwise would be. Here are mentioned birth, the change from childhood into adolescence, death, and burial, the important rite of marriage being reserved for an entire chapter on that ceremony and the general topic of the family. Mr. Tozzer says nothing in this connection which has not been said before, though perhaps his concise presentation of the very difficult subject of social organization may be recommended. At the same time it is difficult to understand why he plays at the game, too common among anthropologists, of standing up the outworn straw men of theories, already adequately refuted, merely for the pleasure of knocking them down again. After a final consideration of law, government, and ethics, there are several conclusions the gist of which may be stated as the conviction that it has yet to be proved that savage man is either essentially different from or inferior to us, or is possessed of a culture less well adapted to his needs than ours is to us. The book ends with an amusing account, based on freshman themes, of the superstitions of college freshmen—which offer striking proof that superstition is not confined to primitive folk.

The End of the Egmont Diary

Manuscripts of the Earl of Egmont. Diary of the First Earl of Egmont (Viscount Percival). Vol. III, 1739-1747, with Appendices and Index. Edited by R. A. Roberts. London: H. M. Stationery Office.

THE publication of the Diary of the First Earl of Egmont is completed by the printing of this third volume from manuscripts in possession of The Historical Manuscripts Commission. While the first and second volumes extend over four and five years respectively, the third covers a longer period of nine years—from 1739 to 1747. It contains fewer pages, doubtless owing to the ill health and old age of the diarist. But its contents abate no jot in interest.

The main theme of the present volume, like that of the second, concerns the transactions of the Trustees of the Georgia Colony. The history of the province during these years is very fully set forth through the reports of officials, the letters of colonial residents, and the detailed conversations of numerous prominent persons who returned from Georgia to England. It is clear that this was a period of stress for the colony. There was danger, even, that the colony might be surrendered to Spain. Walpole appears to have regarded its retention as of no paramount importance, since he sought to place upon the Georgian Trustees the burden of establishing their title against the Spanish claims. They very justly replied that such a duty belonged properly to the government and not to "a set of private gentlemen." Although the trustees made persistent and successful endeavors to retain the colony, yet they had every reason to feel ill rewarded for the many years of disinterested effort they had exerted in behalf of the philanthropic enterprise involved in the founding of Georgia.

Still another danger to the colony at this time arose from the French, who had made peace with the Chickesaw Indians, heretofore friends of the British. In 1740 Egmont writes: "The French are now masters of the Mississippi River, and can join their forces from Quebec, so as at any time to make head against Carolina and Georgia, and drive both into the sea. . . . Colonel Bull has wrote for protection by the addition of more troops, and possibly this may turn out ill for Georgia; for, as Carolina is most favored, if it be resolved to send a regiment thither, the ministry may abandon Georgia to the Spaniards and order Oglethorpe's regiment to Carolina."

While the second volume of the Diary contained many valuable facts about John and Charles Wesley the third volume gives much interesting information concerning their successor, the great evangelist Whitefield. In the first entry of the 3rd of January, 1739, it is said of Whitefield that he goes to Oxford to be ordained priest. Thereafter he collects a considerable sum of money for a church at Ebenezer and an orphan house in Savannah. Stirring scenes follow upon his return in 1741 to Georgia. A year later he was back in England with new demands upon the Trustees. On this occasion he was summoned by the House of Commons as a witness of affairs in Georgia. His descriptions of the province in this volume are thus very full. Opinions varied greatly as to Whitefield's own success in Georgia, but there was no doubt of the views he held, as in his farewell sermon in Savannah he said that "the people there had only been sent to prepare the way for a better set of men."

This final volume is enriched, too, by literary references. A play of Cibber was damned the first night. Although on the second occasion the Prince was invited to save it, not a word could be heard for two acts owing "to such a scandalous noise of hissing, talking, and catcalling." Here is also a striking allusion of Addison: "Lilly, the perfumer at whose house Mr. Addison and the wits of that time used to meet, says that the 4 last verses Mr. Addison made shewed he was tired of life. They were as follows:

Plagued by a vexatious wife,
And tired of this packhorse life,
I'll to the stable hie
And slip my pack and die.

He married the Countess of Warwick, who always passed for a woman of small sense, but it is not known that she gave him any domestic chagrin."

An exhaustive index of 167 pages has been happily added to the third volume. Thus the rare material to be found in this unique chronicle of past times is rendered easily available to every reader.

BENJAMIN RAND

Books in Brief

Principles of Wage Settlement. By Herbert Feis. H. W. Wilson Company. $3.50.

Mr. Feis's book will prove valuable to teachers of labor economics in furnishing material illustrative of the many and intricate problems arising in wage disputes and their settlement. Mr. Feis has not arranged his cases in such a manner as to indicate development of thought or prevalent opinion. One feels that he has only half done his job. Cases of 1908, cases of 1923, cases from Australia, Great Britain, and America are all jumbled together. Moreover, the emphasis is overwhelmingly upon the wage principles enunciated by arbitration courts instead of those illustrated by collective action. The latter are far more significant, since the development of wage policies in the future must rest upon agreement of opinion between the two parties to the wage contract.

Family Welfare Work. By Sophonisba P. Breckenridge. The University of Chicago Press. $4.50.

This volume of selected case records is designed to serve as social data from which instructors of welfare work "will extract accepted principles of case work." It consists of exhaustive histories of maladjusted individuals in their voluntary or enforced contacts with medical, philanthropic, and psychiatric welfare agencies. It introduces the student to standardized practices whereby the feeble-minded, the ne'er-do-well, the unmarried mother, and the economic misfit are brought into harmony with their environment. A metropolitan community like Chicago affords diversified examples of typical and atypical cases; and, since the "case method" is a recognized form of instruction, a study of Miss Breckenridge's book should prove more informing than attendance upon lectures. But it may be questioned whether the "principles" deduced may not prove less sociological laws than generalizations of procedure.

Public Ownership. By Carl D. Thompson. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.

Like many gospelers, Mr. Thompson has no propagandist purpose. He simply wants to present the facts of public ownership, but the miserable facts just insist on public ownership, of course; and if there are any facts that don't so insist, Mr. Thompson either doesn't see them or else, as in the Seattle street-car fiasco, explains them in terms of the private-ownership devil tricking the innocent public-ownership saint. It is not that Mr. Thompson wants to be unfair, but what a man sees naturally depends a good deal on what windows he looks out of. This book, then, is essentially a cyclopedia of facts favorable to public ownership all over the world, with arguments in favor of that policy. In the hands of a discriminating reader it may be very useful, despite the fact that it is uncritical and one-sided. It should be used as an antidote to the tons of private-ownership propaganda that pour weekly from the presses, particularly in connection with the major issue of the control of our future power systems. Compare Mr. Thompson's account of the Ontario Hydro-Electric, for example, with that found in the Murray-Flood Report, and you will never again be guilty of believing anything easily.

The Passing of the Phantoms: A Study of Evolutionary Psychology and Morals. By C. J. Patten. (Today and Tomorrow Series.) E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

The purpose of this small book is to show in brief and sketchy fashion that mental traits, no less than physical, have had an evolutionary history, since the rudiments of memory, attention, and morality are discernible in the behavior of the lower animals. After citing embryological and anatomical facts that point toward man's relationship with lower forms of life, the author describes experiences with ants, gulls, cats, and horses which seem to him to demonstrate clearly the presence of psychic and moral qualities. He believes that even imagination and superstition must be ascribed in some degree to the horse which displays fear of a curiously moving object; and he finds in the dreams of dogs the germ of human animism and theology. Like Kropotkin, Patten lays great stress on "mutual aid" among animals, finding in this manifestation the beginnings of morality; but his observation that birds of prey are harmless and even jocund companions of the weak—once they are full fed—may strike one as bearing very dubious ethical connotations. The progress of mankind is traced through various forms of superstition and sectarianism until, at the end, the reader is invited to view modern man as consisting of two "orders"—the Superstitious and the Non-superstitious.

Memories of a Militant. By Annie Kenney. Longmans, Green and Company. $5.25.

This book is a vivid personal history and interpretation of the militant suffrage movement, with an engaging autobiographical picture of the author's childhood and early struggles. It should be of interest to those who like autobiography, to feminists, and to psychologists who care to study the development of radical movements and their leaders. It throws illuminating sidelights on the psychological reactions of audiences and crowds, and can be recommended as a suggestive textbook for militant movements. Annie Kenney was a Lancashire Lassie born into a working-class family. She and Christabel Pankhurst were the first women imprisoned for militancy, and during Miss Pankhurst's exile in Paris it was to Annie Kenney that she delegated her dictatorship. The author has a gift for relating vividly and swiftly the experiences through which she has lived, and possesses a power of reflection and penetrating analysis which is exceptional in an individual endowed as she is with the religious temperament capable of sustained fanatical devotion in action.

Architecture. By Alfred Mansfield Brooks. (Our Debt to Greece and Rome Series.) Boston: The Marshall Jones Company. $1.25.

To present in a manner simple, "popular," and concise a subject of such complex ramifications as the influence of classical architecture on that of today requires not only a complete knowledge of the architecture of Greece and Rome, not only a realization of the structural technic and the cultural and economic forces which determine forms today, but also an unerring instinct in the differentiating of form and spirit, the accidental and the significant. Professor Brooks seems constantly to mistake the relative values; he constantly and triumphantly points out the obvious as the important. To begin a consideration of Greek architecture with a hard and fast description of the numerical proportions of "the" Doric order is to commit again the sin of Vitruvius; it is an unjustifiable simplification that gives at once a totally wrong impression of Greek artistic genius. Similarly of the examples Professor Brooks chooses; we believe that Ictinus, the architect of the Parthenon, might understand the Hotel Shelton, but at the sight of Grant's Tomb he would feel only nausea.

Gambrinus and Other Stories. By Alexandre Kuprin. Translated from the Russian by Bernard Guilbert Guerney. Adelphi Company. $2.

No one in American literature has done the saloon as Kuprin has done the beer hall in "Gambrinus," wherein sailors and thugs and bums gyrate in a thick fog of stale beer and riotous orgies and sentimental songs. It is a splendid and soul-rousing epic. All of Kuprin's immense vigor and love of life and boisterous irony are gathered into a sustained rhythm and a hymn of life celebrated by dancing tars and sociable burglars.

Essays in the Romantic Poets. By Solomon Francis Gingerich. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

The studies in this volume have the single aim of tracing in the major poets of the romantic age the pervasive presence of the doctrine of necessity which came to them as a heritage from the eighteenth century. They shed a good deal of light on the development of thought in Coleridge and Wordsworth and on the conflict of ill-assimilated systems in Shelley. These men had a conscious philosophic aim in their poetry, which in certain of its aspects will stand some heavy-handed analysis. When applied to Byron's unconfined aspirations, Professor Gingerich's method is rather trifling. To dwell elaborately on the absence of a coherent philosophy where no one would suspect its presence argues a lack of humor on the part of the professor. But lack of humor, alas, is not the only thing that is wrong with this essay. It will give a regrettable opportunity to the cynics who believe that the art of writing is not an essential part of the equipment of a professor of English literature. It would require more than a page of the Nation to transcribe all the unidiomatic and contorted sentences of which Professor Gingerich is guilty. Let one or two suffice as examples: "As compared to other religionists Christians he considers hypocrites." "This grandeur is heightened by the fact that the setting of the story is the most rocky and cavernous and widely beautiful parts of the Alps Mountains, of which, for background and scenic effects, the poet takes full advantage."

Drama

Mid-Season

BY this time last year five plays, each definitely superior to anything which the present season has afforded, had been produced in New York. "A Man's Man," "Craig's Wife," and "Young Woodley" are, considered purely as dramatic literature, the best works of the year written in the English language; but though each of these has a considerable excellence of its own, none is marked by an originality of substance and tone comparable to that of "What Price Glory," "They Knew What They Wanted," or "Desire Under the Elms," and none constitutes an experiment in form like that so successfully carried through in "Processional." "Craig's Wife" depends largely upon its theatrical adroitness and "Young Woodley" depends largely upon a sort of topical interest, while "A Man's Man" is merely vivid naturalism of a thoroughly old-fashioned and unimaginative kind. Thus though each respectably maintains a not unimportant tradition neither carries forward to any appreciable extent the development of the American drama.

Yet such a development, and that in a definite direction, has actually begun, since, diverse as are their methods and temperaments, Messrs. O'Neill, Howard, Anderson, Stallings, and Lawson are alike in one respect: each is struggling to bring into contemporary dramatic literature that sense of largeness and that emotional lift which tended to disappear with the triumph of naturalism and which is so conspicuously absent from such a play as "A Man's Man." Each realizes, unconsciously at least, that some substitute must be found for the spiritual exaltation which old-fashioned romance communicated to those who were capable, as we are not, of accepting it; and each is, in his own way, modifying the realistic tradition with that end in view. Thus, for example, O'Neill's plays tend constantly to assume an almost mystic fervor, while the famous piece by Anderson and Stallings was not, to use the two words which once constituted the highest critical praise, merely "grimly realistic," for without sacrificing essential truth it had the exultant sweep of romance.

Thus far, however, neither of the writers mentioned has contributed anything to the current season worthy of his capacity, so that one must turn from the drama considered as literature to the art of the theater if one is to find current achievements of outstanding importance. The production of "The Dybbuk" at the Neighborhood Playhouse and the productions of "Lysistrata" and "Carmencita and the Soldier" by the Moscow company playing at the Jolson are very successful examples of the tendency to enrich the stage by means which are not primarily literary. Each depends upon a synthesis of aesthetic effects in which the spoken word is no more important than the various appeals to the eye made by a definitely non-realistic style of acting and a setting which aims rather to suggest a mood than to reproduce an actuality. Each makes its appeal to the emotions more directly than do those plays which approach them through the intellect, and each belongs to an art essentially different from that of the stage as the present generation has known it. At the Neighborhood Playhouse alone has this art found a permanent home in America, but it is undoubtedly destined, sooner or later, to play an important part in our dramatic history.

The only recent events which must be recorded are "The Song of the Flame" (Forty-fourth Street Theater), an elaborate operetta of admirable music, well staged and sung by an enormous company, and "Love and Death," a series of three pieces performed by the Moscow Art Theater Musical Studio at the Jolson. One of the three, "Cleopatra," is extremely fine.

I subjoin a list of the current offerings which seem to me most worth seeing:

"A Man's Man" (Fifty-second Street Theater).

"Craig's Wife" (Morosco Theater).

"Young Woodley" (Belmont Theater).

"The Dybbuk" (Neighborhood Playhouse).

Moscow Art Theater Musical Studio (Jolson Theater).

"Androcles and the Lion" (Klaw Theater).

"Arms and the Man" (Garrick Theater).

Serbia's Guilt at Serajevo

FROM the October number of Die Kriegsschuldfrage, published in Berlin, we take the following article by Dr. Friedrich R. von Wiesner concerning the famous Wiesner documents relative to Serbia's guilt or innocence in the matter of the Serajevo murder.

The commission appointed on 25th January, 1919, by the preliminary peace conference to ascertain who was responsible for the outbreak of the war and to fix the penalties to be imposed declared in its report to the conference that "the war was deliberately planned by the Central Powers . . . and was the result of acts which were committed with intention and premeditation in order to make war inevitable." The commission based this conclusion, in so far as the assassination of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand and the deductions drawn therefrom by Austro-Hungary are concerned, on the following "ascertained facts": "A crime committed by an Austro-Hungarian subject within the territory of the Dual Monarchy can in no way compromise Serbia. . . . Quite unexpectedly Austria dispatched to Serbia an ultimatum carefully worded in such a way as to make it impossible of acceptance."

In point 1 of its note of April 4, 1919, the American Delegation not only identified itself with these statements and with the deductions drawn by the commission, but even went so far as to declare that "the war had arisen in consequence of Austria-Hungary's deliberate intention to destroy this brave little country (i. e., Serbia)." In proof of this contention the American note adduced four diplomatic documents, the first of which is "a report drawn up by the Austro-Hungarian agent von Wiesner, who had been sent to Serajevo for the purpose of investigating the assassination of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand." This document is then quoted, the following passage being given as its essential part:

HERR VON WIESNER TO THE MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS IN VIENNA.

Serajevo, 13th July, 1914, 1:10 p. m.

There is nothing to show or even to lead one to conjecture the complicity of the Serbian Government or that it directed or prepared the crime or that it supplied the weapons used. On the contrary, there is evidence that would appear to show that such complicity is out of the question.

This is the much-quoted Wiesner document that runs through the whole of the war-guilt literature of the Entente, a document offering the most unanswerable and crushing proofs that the Austro-Hungarian Government, although in possession of this evidence concerning the innocence of the Serbian Government, nevertheless accused it of having done the very things which the report had declared unproved.

As far back as the middle of 1919, at a time, I must confess, when I had but a vague knowledge of the contents of the American note and its reference to my report, I pointed out that this quotation was incomplete and misleading and that the deductions drawn from it were incorrect. The Austrian Secretariat for Foreign Affairs in the more detailed Red Book published by it in the summer of 1919 issued the full text of my dispatch of July 13, 1914, containing fifty-one printed lines, of which the American note had published only four. Several foreign newspapers made use of this publication of my report to throw light upon the thoroughly wrong and misleading manner in which the Wiesner document had been exploited by the American Delegation. No reply to this statement has ever been published by the other side. As, however, the "document" in its American form and interpretation has been bequeathed from one writer to another like a disease and has had to serve as a flaming proof of the guilt of the Central Powers, I have on several occasions attempted to put an end to this method of adducing arguments as proofs. Such attempts have hitherto proved futile. For the Wiesner Document continues to crop up in its old form and with its old functions, not merely in propaganda literature but also in the works of serious writers, as, for example, in Asquith's recent book on "The Origin of the War," just as if no syllable had ever been uttered against its genuineness and finality. . . .

At the time of the Serajevo murder I was one of the experts on International and State Law employed in the Law Section of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Vienna and I may say that I had formerly been a judge and crown attorney and in these capacities had had to conduct important trials. After the murder of the Archduke I was transferred to the political section, in order to assist the political chief as legal expert. In this office among other work I had to examine and work up the notary evidence collected at Serajevo concerning the assassination, and more especially to state what were the definite results in the way of proof that had come to light in the course of the investigation. As it was difficult to sift this matter in Vienna and as various obscurities and gaps in the evidence were difficult to deal with by correspondence, to say nothing of the delay involved, I was ordered to proceed to Serajevo and get into direct touch with the authorities on the spot in order as speedily as possible to get a clear account of what had happened, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs being desirous of getting clear information as to the connection the murder and the murderers had with Serbia, its Government, its political institutions and other organizations, and the population, including both official and non-official circles. The chief difficulty to be overcome lay in the fact, first, that the military authorities and a part of the political administration were thoroughly convinced that the crime had been carried out with the knowledge and at the wish of the Serbian Government, and, secondly, that the Austrian authorities in question had no proofs to offer for this conviction, apart from their intuitive interpretation of the situation and some vague circumstantial evidence. As the authorities in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs refused to base the steps that were to be taken on the hypothesis of the complicity of the Serbian Government unless they had proofs of it, and as there was, moreover, a report to the effect that by getting into touch with the local authorities on the spot we should be able to furnish the Foreign Office with all the evidence that it appeared to be in need of, I was given the task of finding a way out of this dilemma between a convinced belief and its demonstrability. . . .

My task at Serajevo was therefore plainly mapped out for me. Bearing in mind the state of the corroborative evidence existing at the time I undertook my investigations, I had to inquire what connection, if any, could be discovered between the crime and Serbia. Limited as I was both as to time and material in drawing up my report—a limitation which, though obvious enough, is generally overlooked—it cannot be wondered at that my report has been misinterpreted in a very misleading fashion. Was it right that the American Delegation as late as 1919 should regard it as a proof of Serbia's innocence that I on 13th July, 1914, had, in the necessarily restricted scope of the evidence available, evidence that was incomplete wherever one turned, failed to discover any proof of Serbia's guilt?

I arrived at Serajevo on July 11, 1914, and in the three days and two nights that followed I went through the whole of the material that was laid before me, scrutinizing and discussing it. Certain obscure points and various gaps in this material were during this scrutiny elucidated and filled up as far as possible. I summed up the results of my investigations in my dispatch to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs dated 13th July. The text of my dispatch was as follows:

That Pan-Serbian propaganda is being carried on here from Serbia as a center, not only through the press but also through clubs and other organizations, and further that this is taking place with the encouragement as well as with the

THE BIOLOGY OF POPULATION GROWTH

BY RAYMOND PEARL

Director of the Institute for Biological Research of the Johns Hopkins University

"It would be a notable book, indeed, if it contained nothing new. But it contains a great deal that is new, and much that is important. . . . It is packed with interesting material, presented in an admirably lucid and succinct manner."—H. L. Mencken.

The scope of the book is indicated by the chapter headings, as follows: How Things Grow; The Growth of Experimental Populations of Drosophila; The Indigenous Native Population of Algeria; The Mortality of the Native Population of Algeria; The Birth Rate of the Native Population of Algeria; The Influence of Density of Population on Fertility; The Differential Birth Rate and the Population Problem; Human Behavior and the Birth Rate; Summary and Conclusions.

The text is fully illustrated with diagrams and tables. An extensive bibliography is included. This book contains matter of interest to all students of human biology, anthropologists, sociologists, economists, physicians, psychologists, and hygienists and health officers, as well as the professional biologist.

THE HISTORY AND PROSPECTS OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

EDITED BY Harry Elmer Barnes

"A book so pertinent, so authoritative and so interesting as The History and Prospects of the Social Sciences is seldom published. It consists of ten essays, each being a history of one of the social sciences, a summary of contemporary thought in that field, and a discussion of the immediate outlook. The merits of these articles can be judged by their authors: History, H. E. Barnes; Human Geography, Jean Brunhes; Biology, H. M. Parshley; Social Psychology, Kimball Young; Cultural Anthropology, A. A. Goldenweiser; Sociology, F. H. Hankins; and Jurisprudence, Roscoe Pound."—Post Intelligencer. $5.00 knowledge and approval of the Serbian Government is the conviction of authoritative circles here. The material that has been laid before me by the civil and military authorities as the basis on which they have formed their conviction may be characterized as follows: the material belonging to the period preceding the assassination offers no evidence that would lead me to suppose that propaganda was encouraged by the Serbian Government. There is, however, material which, though sparse, is sufficient to show that this movement with Serbia as a center was fostered by clubs with the toleration of the Serbian Government.

Investigation of the crime: There is nothing to show the complicity of the Serbian Government in the directing of the assassination or in its preparation or in the supplying of weapons. Nor is there anything to lead one even to conjecture such a thing. On the contrary, there is evidence that would appear to show that such complicity is out of the question. From the statements of the persons charged with the crime, it has been ascertained in a manner hardly controvertible that the crime was resolved upon in Belgrade and that it was prepared with the assistance of a Serbian state official named Ciganovic and of Major Tancosic, these two men providing the bombs, ammunition, and cyanide of potassium. The participation of Pribicevic has not been proved and the first reports on this point are due to a regrettable misunderstanding on the part of the police authorities investigating the case. It has been proved objectively and beyond all doubt that the bombs originally came from the Serbian army magazine at Kragujevac, but there is no evidence to show that they had only recently been taken from this magazine for the special purpose for which they were employed, as the bombs may have belonged to the war stores of the Comitatschis.

Judging by the statements made by the accused, we can scarcely doubt that Princip, Cabrinovic, and Grabez were secretly smuggled across the frontier into Bosnia with bombs and arms by Serbian organs at the instigation of Ciganovic. These organized transports were conducted by the Frontier Captains Schabatz and Loznica and carried out by organs of the excise guards. Even though it has not been ascertained whether these men were aware of the purpose of the journey, they must surely have assumed the mysterious nature of the mission. Other investigations made subsequent to the assassination throw light upon the organization of the propaganda of the Narodna Odbrana. The material obtained is valuable and can be turned to account. It has yet to be carefully examined. Investigations are being made with all speed.

In the event of intentions which prompted my departure still remaining unchanged, the demands could be still further extended:

(a) The suppression of cooperation of Serbian Government organs in the smuggling of persons and articles across the frontier.

(b) Dismissal of Serbian Frontier Captains Schabatz and Loznica, as well as of the excise guard organs concerned.

(c) Prosecution of Ciganovic and Tancosic.

I leave this evening, arriving Vienna Tuesday evening. Will come straight to the Ministry. It is necessary that I should supplement my remarks with verbal report.

If one compares this detailed text of my report, which takes account of different points of view, with the single paragraph torn out of its context by the American note, one is forced to admit that the American note is wrong in referring to this quotation as the "essential part" of my report. For it is just that part of my report which is not contained in the American note which is to be regarded as essential. Did the ultimatum delivered to Serbia accuse the Serbian Government of complicity in the assassination and of lending active assistance in carrying it out? If this were the case, my dispatch would really afford a proof of mala fides in the procedure of the Vienna

Government. As it is, however, my report proves, on the contrary, that our Government, in spite of all the circumstantial evidence and grounds for suspicion telling against the Serbian Government, held strictly to the situation created by the actual evidence available at that time. Essential factors in my report were the discovery of the connection between the crime and Serbian officers, as well as all sorts of government officials, and furthermore the toleration of Serbian propaganda by the Serbian Government. And now let the reader take the text of the ultimatum and see whether it contains a single accusation which is not covered by facts that can be clearly proved; whether it makes a single demand that is not justified by the result of the investigations. The Geneva journal La Feuille clearly recognized this as far back as October, 1919, and summed up its opinion in the following terse sentences: "The sentence quoted by the American Delegation is not a confession on the part of Austria which can justifiably be used to show that Austria's official statement is given the lie by its own officials; this sentence is nothing more than a loyal utterance in the midst of accusations of the gravest nature, the only accusations that count, seeing that Austria-Hungary has nowhere accused the Serbian Government itself, but has brought its accusations only against certain Serbian functionaries and certain Pan-Slavistic organizations. These accusations, however, are formulated in detail in the Wiesner Document. The American Delegation has juggled them out of existence. One needs only to read H. von Wiesner's report to see that, far from being in opposition to the steps taken at such a late hour by the Vienna Government, the report is in reality the very basis of the action taken by the Vienna Government and contains the essential elements of this action. When compared with the arbitrary quotation cited by the American Delegation, von Wiesner's report shows that this famous commission has, to put it bluntly, falsified the sense of it by dubbing a few sentences arbitrarily torn out of their context 'the essential part' of the report, while at the same time suppressing the main part of the report, which was identical with the Austrian standpoint." . . .

Be this as it may, a certain suspicion rests upon the American Delegation of having, either consciously or carelessly, made use of a document which was a gross falsification for the purpose of supporting its argument. It is accordingly in the interest not only of truth but also of the prestige of the American Delegation that the following questions should receive a clear answer:

1. From what source did the American Delegation derive its knowledge of my report from Serajevo dated 13th July, 1914, a report which, as the American note says, was in this note quoted for the first time?

2. In what form did the American Delegation receive this report? In the original draft or only in an extract? If the latter was the case, what was the context? Was the text received by the delegation in German or was it in some other language? If not in German, in what language?

3. Did the American Delegation, supposing it received only an extract from the report, take any steps to make itself acquainted with the whole document? If so, what information did it receive on the point? . . .

These questions, it is true, can receive an authentic answer only in America, for the documents of the American Delegation must still be in existence. They are documents which would clear up this matter beyond a doubt. Moreover, to the best of my knowledge, both members of the delegation, Messrs. Robert Lansing and James Brown Scott, are still living.

It would be welcomed as a distinct step forward if these questions could be solved. It would then be explained how it was that the American Delegation came to base their note upon a document the sense and purpose of which have been distorted by shortening it, with the result that it now appears to prove the exact contrary of what it was originally intended that it should prove.

Superstition or Rationality in the Action for Peace? A Criticism of Jurisprudence

By A. V. LUNDSTEDT

The author endeavors to show that the so-called Law of Nations is only a baleful phantom. He holds that the legal ideas in the international province are nothing but survivals from primitive superstitions thousands of years old, and formed into the modern "Law of Nations" by Hugo Grotius exactly three hundred years ago.

"Dr. Lundstedt here throws a rather heavy money-wrench into the machinery of legal conceptions in the interest of what he regards as a more rational and effective way of working for world peace than that hitherto followed."—Boston Transcript.

The Ascent of Man by Means of Natural Selection

By ALFRED MACHIN

The author has sought to interpret the ascent of man by means of Darwin's theory of Natural Selection. Progress—the development of civilization from savagery, and the development of civilization itself—it is submitted, is due to a conquest of nature, and to a discipline and development of human nature, and eventuates from a natural selection of the fittest in the competition between individuals and between societies, of the human race.

or the Mechanical Extension of Mankind

A new volume of THE TODAY AND TOMORROW SERIES in which GARET GARRETT calls attention to the terrific momentum with which machine power is increasing in the world today, says that the industrial equipment already in operation is so great that if it were worked at capacity for one year, markets would be glutted and producers ruined. Yet the foreign markets are narrowing rather than expanding because of the industrial development of such countries as Italy, India and China. The significance of machine power to the commerce, finance and even the civilization of the future is here set forth by Mr. Garrett in a manner which deserves careful attention. $1.00

The anthracite coal business is controlled by perhaps the most odious monopoly that ever arose among a free people. This trust maintains its power by the possession of two privileges; it has acquired control or ownership of 98 per cent of all the anthracite coal in Pennsylvania, which means the country. . . . The other privilege enjoyed by the trust is that through related organizations they control all the railroads leading out of the anthracite fields. They have driven out practically all the independent operators through the control of these railroads by discriminating against them in transportation.

THIS HERESY was voiced by the new Governor of New Jersey, A. Harry Moore, in his inaugural address on January 19. Will some one please call Calvin Coolidge's attention to it? If the President should read further he would find the Governor saying that the Sherman law had been invoked in vain and that the monopoly had been denounced before the Federal Trade Commission and the United States courts, all to no purpose. Governor Moore wishes a tri-state commission to be formed by New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey to condemn mines containing anthracite and to set up competition against the trust by a coal railroad to be built from the mines to tidewater in New Jersey. This plan would, he declares, absolutely destroy the anthracite coal monopoly and would bring to the people of the East and to industry a never-failing coal supply at $10 a ton. Meanwhile, Governor Pinchot's coal bills to make anthracite production a public service function, and to give the Governor power to regulate the retail business of selling coal, have been done to death in the Pennsylvania Legislature. At least Governor Pinchot has tried. Mr. Coolidge refuses to move despite his thundering last summer. Fortunately, the miners have not given up trying for a settlement; as we go to press they are again in conference with the operators.

THOMAS W. LAMONT and Otto H. Kahn are often to be found enlisted in undertakings that call for vision and idealism. Hence we are the more amazed at the crass materialism of their defense of Mussolini before the Foreign Policy Association, or rather their worship of certain of his achievements. Mr. Lamont dwelt upon the wiping out of unemployment, the ending of strikes, the changing of the deficit into a surplus, and the balancing of the budget. He even stated that the people of Italy, terrorized and cowed and deprived of free speech as they are, with their necks under the heel of a dictatorship such as the world has hardly seen since the days of Bomba of Naples, are unanimously behind their government. "As to the matter of liberalism," said Mr. Lamont, "the question seems to me to be liberal enough to let Italy have the sort of government she seems to want." We should like to hear from Mr. Lamont if he is liberal enough to let Russia have the government she seems to want, to say nothing of China. As for Mr. Kahn, we find it hard to believe our eyes in reading his statement that Mussolini is "no dictator." We fail to recognize these words as descriptive of Mussolini: "Single handed, equipped with nothing but the genius of his brain, the force of his character, and the ardor of his patriotism, he flung himself against that sinister portent [the faltering of the Italian people] and set the Italian nation once more on the high road to national achievement." "I bow," said Mr. Kahn, "before the solitary figure who encompassed it." Is it not treason to all American idealism to applaud one who boasts that he has wiped his feet on the "prostrate form of liberty" and glories in it; who admits that he carries on by force and violence contrary to all law and democracy?

FOR LOGIC commend us to Calvin Coolidge. Senator Norris having charged him with improper use of his office in connection with the several federal commissions—by asking members to sign their resignations in advance and otherwise making them subservient to him—the "official spokesman" for the White House made the following remarkable explanation of the President's relation to these independent commissions: He thinks they are responsible neither to Congress nor to the Executive but to the law which created them and laid down their powers. But the law must be enforced by somebody and that somebody is, of course, the Executive. So Mr. Coolidge regards himself as the power which must see that these laws are obeyed! This new theory that the President has nothing to do with a commission in his role as President, but has everything to do with it in his capacity as Enforcer of the Law of the United States, is the clearest possible revelation of the confusion so characteristic of Mr. Coolidge's thinking. As a matter of fact, any court would hold that a commission, if subject to anybody, is subject to its creator, which in this case is not the law but the body that passed the law. Congress intended these commissions to be independent of the President. Mr. Coolidge intends that they shall reflect his views on every question that comes before them. That's the thing in a nutshell, and it is an issue of enormous importance to the future of democratic government in America.

MEANWHILE SENATOR NORRIS has gone further in his revelations of improper acts by President Coolidge in his efforts to manipulate the federal commissions. William S. Culbertson, it will be recalled, was finally got out of the Tariff Commission by appointing him to a diplomatic post, but previous to this he had been dogged in such a way that he obviously felt it impossible to stand the strain of presidential pressure any longer. Senator Norris explained one angle of this persecution when he told the Senate how Mr. Culbertson had been hounded by charges made against him for having lectured at the Williamstown Institute of Politics and at Georgetown University. Senator Norris made it plain that the charges had been pushed by the White House in order to induce Mr. Culbertson to vote to delay the sugar report. Another echo of old Republican scandal was heard recently when Mr. Harding's Attorney General, Harry M. Daugherty, was compelled under threat of contempt of court to tell a federal grand jury in New York City about the records in the bank at Washington Court House, Ohio, which were vainly demanded by the Senate investigating committee. What Mr. Daugherty told the grand jury is not yet disclosed, but it may come out in the pending suit—the case against Thomas W. Miller, former Alien Property Custodian.

THE VOTING OF CLOTURE in the Senate in the World Court debate is the Senate's answer to the Vice-President and its other critics who declare that the present rules do not adequately limit debate and result in endless delays. As a matter of fact the World Court issue seems to us, if anything, to have been rushed through the Senate. The question is one of enormous importance and it ought to have been debated at length. Unfortunately, it has been treated by both party machines as a political issue. It is probable that if Senators were free to vote on this issue as they chose they would vote it down. Some, like Senator Copeland, are tied by pledges they now regret. Others, many Democrats among them, hope that the reservations will keep us out of the Court, but because it is a party measure they will vote for it. Republicans there are who cynically boast of their dislike of the Court but say they are voting for it because Mr. Coolidge asks them to and they will need his aid next fall. Mr. Lenroot, to whom the leadership in the Senate has been intrusted, is himself a potential "lame duck"; he hopes, though doubtless in vain, to ward off defeat next fall by posing as the hero of this Senatorial joust.

THE REPLY which Mexico has made through the press to the complaint which our Department of State voiced in a similar manner against her new land and petroleum laws is tit for tat in diplomacy. In addition, in the opinion of the New York Times, it "is conciliatory while firm in upholding Mexico's undoubted rights, and answers categorically and to the point the questions which have been raised by our Government." This, though, is not of great consequence if American oil interests have exerted pressure upon the Administration, as it would seem they have, to back their demand for modifications in the new legislation. If our Government sincerely desired justice for its citizens, instead of special favors, it would propose that the difficulties be arbitrated. Instead the Department of State announces that we had no "secret understandings" as the price of our recognition of Mexico and contradicts the statement in the next breath by saying there were "verbal assurances." The truth is that the entire Payne-Warren "agreement," which preceded our recognition of Mexico, was contrary to the spirit of our Constitution, according to which the understanding should have been drawn as a treaty and submitted to the Senate for ratification. We are glad that Senator La Follette has asked for all the details of this usurpation of one of the Senate's powers. We have had far too much of this diplomacy by administrative "agreement," instead of by constitutional treaty.

CARDINAL MERCIER faced with unfaltering courage the German invaders of his country, and it is for this that he will longest be remembered. Rather than retract his ringing pastoral letter he risked prison and expected it. His "Appeal to Truth" remains one of the stirring utterances of a war of which few documents can survive the test of time and scientific inquiry. Beyond doubt he roused public opinion throughout the world against the Germans who, confessedly, were unable to decide what to do about him. Edith Cavell's heroic death supplemented the work Cardinal Mercier had begun. Both were recruiting sergeants of enormous value to their side in the struggle. Those who knew the Cardinal spoke often of his saintly qualities. His learning was extensive, especially in the field of philosophy, and he was beyond doubt an extremely picturesque personality. Yet had the war not given him the opportunity for his consummate bravery he would have died almost unknown beyond the confines of his church.

THE EXCISE DUTY on Indian manufactured cotton goods, the most tangible evidence in India of British political domination employed to secure economic control, was suspended by ordinance on December 1, last, and the Government of India has promised, if the situation permits, to abolish the duty in the next budget. This duty has stood for fifty years. India has long been the great market for British cotton manufactures. So when a duty of 3½ per cent was laid upon cotton goods imported into India, an equal excise tax was placed upon cotton fabrics made in India, in order that the mills of Lancashire might not be at a disadvantage. The latter tax, it is true, has never been increased, although the import duty has been advanced to 11 per cent. Still the excise tax has remained as an intrinsic injury to the Indian textile industry and a sentimental thorn in Indian pride. Although the Government of India several years ago promised to abolish the excise duty at the first possible opportunity, it continually refused to take the action, and the present move comes only as the result of special circumstances. In July, 1925, the Bombay mill-owners, owing to the accumulation of a large stock of unsold goods, announced a general reduction of wages amounting to about 11½ per cent, stating that Japanese competition was capturing the Indian market and forcing the cut.

THE WORKERS at once went on strike. By the end of September the strikers numbered 125,000 and sixty-five of eighty-two mills in Bombay were closed. The owners petitioned the Indian Government to remove the excise duty as a means of relief, but the latter at first refused, saying that it could not afford to forego the revenue. Meanwhile the strike kept on. Increasing pressure was brought to bear upon the Government, and at last it yielded. The expected protest from Lancashire has not developed. Various reasons are assigned. One is that the Lancashire spinners have learned that Indian affairs must now be settled according to native notions and that interference will react unfavorably on their trade. Another reason, possibly more potent, is that the Lancashire business is being forced out by Japanese competition. A glance at the Indian import figures for cotton piece-goods and yarn would seem to show this. With their market going anyhow, the Lancashire mill-owners may have felt that a fight would not be worth while. The abolition of the excise tax by the Government of India removes an effective weapon from the Nationalist arsenal. But, like most other great British concessions to Indian demands, it has probably been granted too late, too grudgingly.

THE REPORT of the committee appointed by Surgeon General Cumming to investigate the dangers of ethyl gasoline is not as reassuring as many persons desirous of presenting a clean bill of health for this new motor fuel have been trying to make the public believe. In the first place the committee did not study the effect upon workers of the manufacture of tetra-ethyl lead or the blending of it in gasoline. As it is in these processes that all known deaths have occurred so far, it should be obvious that the findings of the committee do not touch the chief source of complaint at all. Whether the making of ethyl gasoline should be permitted, and if so under what safeguards, remains to be determined. So far as the use of ethyl gasoline goes, the committee did not find any harmful effects upon chauffeurs, but feels that the subject should have further study. Most disquieting, however, is the evidence of lead dust in garages, whether using ethyl gasoline or not, in quantities that may constitute a definite menace to the employees. This, as well as the dangers in the making of ethyl gasoline, deserves further investigation, and we heartily concur in the recommendation of the committee that Congress appropriate funds for a continuing study of the subject to be made under direction of the Public Health Service.

THE NO-LYNCHINGS-IN-1926 record did not last very long. Before January was a fortnight old, Florida had broken the ice and dispatched a Negro "suspected of having made an attack on a white woman." Meanwhile in Mississippi Sheriff Glass, the officer who was "unable" to protect his Negro prisoner—a man just acquitted of the murder of a white plantation manager—from a mob has been fined $500, the maximum penalty that the law permitted short of being removed from office; and he has been threatened by Judge W. A. Alcorn with prompt removal in case he should find himself "overcome" by a mob in the future. Mississippi last year led the South—which is to say the world—in the number of these barbaric killings by mobs; but in Mississippi, too, the seeds of justice to the Negro are sprouting and bearing fruit. Decent citizens in the State are aroused to protest and to action; reform is coming from within, where it is always most effective and salutary. There is no doubt that Louisiana, Texas, Florida are watching their neighbor; it is only a question of time before they, too, must bestir themselves. The Negro is no longer a slave; he is becoming less and less a peon. With the advance of education and economic independence among members of the black race must go an advance in political independence and solidarity. Mississippi does well to begin the reform of its treatment of the Negro before that oppressed and harassed race finds itself in a position to demand better treatment in a voice that cannot be denied. Perhaps, indeed, it is the first faint notes of such a voice that have set the ball to rolling.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT in Washington of a new set of seven annual awards of $400 to be provided by the William E. Harmon Foundation for American Negroes distinguishing themselves in literature, music, the fine arts, industry, science, education, and religion comes on the crest of a most remarkable wave in Negro culture. The period which produced the great "spirituals" belongs to the irrecoverable past, as does that more recent period wherein Negro art and thought were chiefly imitative of white modes. The Negro has now a voice and hand which he may proudly call his own; and it would be fatal for any student of contemporary forms of expression to be ignorant of that fact. The Harmon awards have numerous predecessors in the way of prizes offered with the design of uncovering talents awaiting recognition either in the centers of Negro population or elsewhere over the country. The Amy Spingarn prizes in literature and art, offered through the Crisis, have drawn out work of indubitable excellence; and it is worth noting that the list of judges this year includes such names as H. G. Wells, Sinclair Lewis, J. E. Spingarn, Eugene O'Neill, and Robert Morss Lovett. As much or more may be expected of the contest recently announced by Opportunity and made possible through gifts by Casper Holstein. Prizes are to be given for stories, poems, plays, essays, and musical compositions, and the result of the enterprise should be an awakening of Negro art even more lively than that which attended the Opportunity contest last year. The New Negro is not only justifying his name; he is making us wonder how many still newer Negroes there will be.

CHARLES M. DOUGHTY, whose death at eighty-two has been reported from London, was one of the most interesting members of a passing generation in England. He was both a far traveler and a poet—sharing this twofold distinction with W. H. Hudson and Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, recently dead, and with Thomas Hardy and Robert Cunninghame Graham, who happily continue to manifest their vigor through the printing of new books. Hudson and Cunninghame Graham in South America, Blunt in Africa, Hardy in vanished Wessex, Doughty in Arabia; it is a great list, and though for various reasons Doughty was perhaps the least widely known of the five he was by no means the least among them. He published several works in verse, the most important of these being a huge epic in six volumes called "The Dawn in Britain." He cast this story of earliest England in a style, even a grammar, of his own; and only those who have taken the trouble to master the difficulties involved in reading the poem have recognized its nobility. So with "Arabia Deserta," Doughty's prose masterpiece, which is by no means easy reading, but which, once read, must be acknowledged one of the great travel narratives of all time.

Is the World Court an Agency for Peace?

ONCE more we are asked to state our position on the World Court as an instrument of peace and as a step toward that community of nations which has been mankind's goal for centuries. Those who question us admit that the Court has its defects, but they advance the same arguments used when anyone points out the faults in the organization of the League of Nations. These are: "Well, come in and join and we'll improve it"; "Our own form of government was a failure at first and had to develop gradually into a real success"; "The Court, like the League, is young—give it the opportunity to grow"; "Like all reformers you refuse to join the Court because it does not exactly suit you instead of being practical and taking a three-quarter loaf when you can get it."

To these queries and comments we reply once more that we are opposed to the United States joining the Court except with a reservation that no force shall be used in carrying out any decrees affecting the United States, and with other safeguards. It is a sham and a pretense to offer the Court in its present form to the American people as an instrument of peace. Not only do multitudes so regard it but they also have been given the idea that everybody will run to submit his grievance to it and that the Court can compel attendance in some miraculous way even if offending nations are not members of the League or the Court itself. It has carefully been kept from the public that the Court's jurisdiction is extremely limited, so much so that, aside from the matter of advisory opinions, which may be requested by the Council of the League of Nations, it cannot take cognizance, even by consent of the parties involved, of those political and economic questions which today chiefly cause war. If force is to be used to carry out its decrees, it will by that much contribute to the continuance of war in the world. It will legalize wars sanctioned and provided for in the name of peace precisely as the Covenant of the League of Nations today provides and plans for war. Both contemplate keeping alive standing armies and the professional soldiery whose talk does so much to make peoples and governments plot, plan, and provide for war. Why should we in an era when the people of the world are thirsting for peace deliberately set up new institutions that make for force? If there is one lesson from the World War it is the utter failure of force. In China it has failed and in India; wherever one turns. It settles nothing; at best it merely postpones issues. Then why should reasonable people go into organizations which talk about sanctions, by which they mean not public opinion but the law of tooth and claw, of the bomb and of poison gas? What intelligent people are trying to do is to outlaw war. That is what counts and not the setting up of new international bodies or courts that legalize war and deliberately contemplate the creating of war in given contingencies.

Of course, we are well aware that at this point we shall be asked whether any court can get on without a force in esse or in posse ready to carry out its decrees. We are fortunately in a position to quote some extremely practical statesman who have intrenched themselves on exactly the same ground in this matter of force. There was the late Senator P. C. Knox, for instance, a big-business man, a former Secretary of State, and a former Attorney General. He was absolutely opposed to the use of force to support the decrees of a world court. No one will charge Charles E.

Hughes with being a pacifist or an impractical editor. Yet he has stated that "when nations agree to submit a dispute to a tribunal and to abide by the decision, its observance is a point of international honor of the highest sort. You can really have no better sanction than this." He also pointed out that "all contrivances for maintaining peace by economic pressure, as well as by military force . . . are likely to fail when they are most needed because national interests are diverse and unanimity of action under stress of crises . . . is well nigh impossible." Mr. Hughes is a modern. Oliver Ellsworth once stood before the Connecticut Convention to declare that the States must choose between a coercion of law and a coercion of arms, and to assert that the latter would lead inevitably to a war of States. James Madison stated that "the more he reflected on the use of force, the more he doubted the practicability, the justice, the efficacy of it." A union of States, containing such an ingredient, seemed to him to provide for its own destruction. The use of force against a State would look like a declaration of war. John Marshall also had his doubts about the use of force. As long as force is provided for the World Court, or the United States cannot safeguard itself against the use of force in matters to which it is a party, or in the outcome of which it has an interest, we shall have to stand with Senator Borah in thinking of the Court as an instrument of war and not one of peace.

There are other points which we might dwell upon, such as the question of advisory opinions through which the League can exercise political control over any country, even one which is not a member, as witness the treatment of Turkey in the Mosul case. Some advocates of the League are frank to say privately that that is what they want, just as they say privately that they believe that our entering the Court will get us into the League and that is why they are for it, while at the same time trying to prove publicly that the Court has no relationship whatever with the League. But we do not care to go into these points at this juncture. What is controlling with us is this question of force.

We would once more make our position plain: The Nation is in favor of a World Court with obligatory jurisdiction in legal questions, but depending only upon its moral authority for the bringing of disputants into court and for the enforcement of its decrees. We desire a court absolutely separated from the League of Nations, controlled as it is by a group of three or four powerful countries. We believe in a court which shall not be called upon to give advisory opinions to the League or its Council and will be unable to do so if asked, but shall be willing to give advisory opinions to individual nations in their individual capacity and not as members of the League. We desire no sanctions for such a court save public opinion; we are opposed to the use of any political or military machinery to enforce any decree, and we submit that the success of arbitration since 1787 affords no room for doubt, despite four or five rejections of arbitral decisions, that the authority of the kind of court we have described would be sufficient to make the nations of the world accept its decrees. If any nation did not, it would face world-wide odium and reproach, but even such a refusal could be only a temporary backset to a court rightly organized and avowedly conducted with entire faith in the public opinion of the world.

The Touring Car Passes

THE New York Automobile Show has confirmed the most striking recent development in the automobile industry: the touring car passes. None of the old-fashioned type were on exhibition. Where there were such they were usually sport models or touring cars elaborately dressed up with wind-shield for the back seat after the manner of the French open car. But these were for the very young or the very rich; the old type of car in which you could stow the whole family and their luggage, together with several friends and the family dog and cat, has vanished. Not even the compromise California body has stayed the hand of fate; the American is to use his car winter and summer whether he drives in the city or tours to the Rockies or to Florida or to Quebec for winter sports.

This development is the more interesting because in the closed cars the trend is all to smaller and narrower bodies and less head-room than ever. As Walter P. Chrysler has prophesied, the whole drift is toward the smaller car, not only for city use, but for touring. In the cities the advantage is obvious, while the improvement in the roads has made touring in a machine with a short wheel-base less trying than in former years when everybody sought to buy the longest chassis his purse could afford. But why the bodies should be so made that only two persons can sit on the back seat in comfort, especially when they have winter coats on, is hard to understand. Many people will believe that here the fashion is deliberately set by the makers in order to get people to buy new cars. But this is a dangerous game for the makers to play for the reason that the second-hand car market is already badly overstocked; if one sells a good car after two years, even of the Packard or Pierce-Arrow type, one cannot get 33 per cent of the cost. Indeed, the sale value is cut in half after the first twelve months of ownership. Yet in order to stimulate sales the makers have been holding out every inducement to people to trade in their old cars and to buy new ones on time payments. That they often have heavy losses on these transactions is beyond doubt, but they prefer the situation to one in which the owner will hold on to his car for five or six years as he easily can so far as the mechanical worth of the average automobile is concerned.

The small closed body has serious disadvantages for traveling; for the carrier on the running-board does not solve the problem of the bestowal of luggage. It is a far cry from the days when you could get a good-sized steamer trunk into the space between the front and rear seats and still have room for your legs. Then, convenient as the closed car is, it will never take the place of the touring car on beautiful spring or autumn days when, with the top down, one can survey the countryside as far as one can see. Curiously enough, the collapsible winter top, so fashionable in Europe, hardly appears here; American manufacturers seem unable to make a landau-top that will not in the course of time let the water seep in.

Whatever the styles, the public is just as mad about cars as ever and the crowds at the New York show broke all records. This year like the last starts in with still another new car offered to the public. The January production of some cars was at high-water mark and some of the companies making accessories report the largest sales in their several histories. The saturation-point is not yet reached, and the motor-bus industry is hardly out of its infancy.

Again the Students Speak

BY a vote of 1,099 to 701 the men students of Ohio State University have declared in favor of the abolition of compulsory military training. By a majority, however, they voted that optional military training had a legitimate place in the curriculum and that they themselves had received some benefit from drill. Their vote added momentum to the movement against compulsion rather than against military training itself. The proportion of students who voted was disappointingly small.

The comparatively small vote is the more surprising in view of the active campaign carried on by both sides in the controversy. In the life of Ohio State University the Reserve Officers' Training Corps means far more than it does at the College of the City of New York. It is one of the largest and best-drilled groups in the country, consisting of some 3,500 students. It has its own special uniform which is intended to set forth most favorably the manly beauty of the wearer both in his own eyes and in the eyes of the girls with whom he is associated in the pursuit of jazz and culture. There are over twenty commissioned officers of the army in the university, to say nothing of sergeants to whom life in a university is greatly preferable to the dull routine of an army post. These gentlemen, more or less ably assisted by the privileged members of the student Officers' Club and the Pershing Rifles, fought the Optional Drill League in debates and discussions both formal and informal, most of which were carefully reported in the university paper.

Three arguments of the military appear to have had weight. The first was that opposition to military training in the colleges is part of an immense bolshevist-pacifist plot. One speaker assured the students that in voting against the R. O. T. C. they would go with a group which was inciting to "riot, revolution, and violence." The same speaker at another time said that a man who "gets lost in dreams of a sort of world-wide brotherhood or this internationalism we hear so much about becomes in reality a man without a country." The most amazing declaration was made by a student on the alleged authority of "a professor in class" that "the European governments have already sent over $40,000,000 to New York to finance the Optional Drill Leagues in the colleges." By such fairy tales are men trained for intelligent citizenship.

A second point much stressed by advocates of compulsory drill is "its efficacy in teaching the student later in life to handle men." This is an argument which ought to make organized labor sit up and take notice. The military conception of handling men is the absolute antithesis of industrial democracy. Its attempted application by a military-academy graduate in the affairs of the International Tailoring Company recently brought about an exceedingly bitter strike which the company finally lost.

But such arguments, the discussions made plain, were all secondary. The real purpose of the R. O. T. C. is to prepare us for or against another war. And it was tacitly, if not openly, admitted that the great value of such preparation was psychological rather than actual. When the editor-in-chief of the Ohio Lantern, who had seen two years' service in France, taunted the men of the R. O. T. C. on the military ineffectiveness of their drill for actual war there was no answer. There was some attempt to prove that men who took the course for four years learned something of military value.

But since the last two years are optional, that argument had little weight in justifying compulsion for the first two years. General Orten let the cat out of the bag in saying that what drill there now is "doesn't even begin to make the sort of army we really need. It isn't even a fair start." And Colonel Shipp hailed the R. O. T. C. as furnishing "a connecting link between the permanent military establishment and the people."

There you have it. Compulsory training in the colleges is the entering wedge for militarizing our youth. It is not worth what it costs from the army's point of view except as it teaches men to accept the inevitability, or at least the high probability, of war and to prepare themselves for it. The compelling objection to this compulsory training is that this semi-fatalistic acceptance of the inevitability of war is one of the chief obstacles to the establishment of permanent peace. With it always goes fear, and public opinion fertilized by fear is soil prepared for the seeds of war. As was to be expected, in the debates and discussions at Ohio State a great point was made of the military preparedness of foreign countries, especially Japan.

Thus is the issue drawn. It is not primarily a question, What shall we do with our college students? but How do we expect to preserve peace? We are glad to observe that the Ohio pastors' convention, at the time of the vote at the university, went on record, without dissenting voice, against compulsion in the university and against all military training in high schools. The church could not do less and be loyal to its own recent declarations. We hope that the faculty committee now considering the subject at Ohio State University, the faculty itself, and the trustees with whom the final power lies will accede to the request of the students for optional drill. For the moment Ohio State University symbolizes both the fight for peace and against compulsion. But the fight itself is bigger than any one university and concerns every American citizen.

Country Dance Tunes

ANTIQUARIANS have not paid much attention to American country dances. They have spent most of their time on folk songs and made fascinating collections of cowboy music, Indian songs, and chanteys. When Cecil J. Sharp placed a book of songs from North Carolina beside his numerous English collections, Americans began to appreciate these "lonesome tunes," and searchers are still following in his footsteps. Explorers in the rich field of Negro spirituals within the last year have added "The Battle of Jericho" and other new favorites to the familiar "Go Down Moses" and "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot." Of the dance tunes everybody knows "Pop Goes the Weasel" and "Turkey in the Straw." They are hardly antiques yet, and so they are not to be found in libraries. The one collector who has made a volume of country dances, Elizabeth Burchenal of the American Folk Dance Society, is more interested in the steps than in the tunes.

The folk songs happen to be comparatively local, while the dances are known over the country. The "Arkansas Traveller" was played and danced in New England, the "Boston Fancy" in Western mining towns; Georgia fiddlers in their prize contests played many of the same tunes that Mollie Dunham learned in Maine. Henry Ford, who imported Mollie and started him on his present triumphal career over the Keith vaudeville circuit, is offering a cup as prize in a contest in Michigan, and this has inspired fiddlers in their eighties to polish up "Money Musk" and the "Devil's Dream."

But how does one dance without a drum and a saxophone? Can a single fiddle playing an unharmonized melody make the rhythm strong enough? Examine the tunes and you will have the answer. The harmony is so simple that the three major triads usually suffice; and these are often supplied by swift embroidery in the form of broken chords. The same sixteen bars are played over and over again without a pause, so that the beat is grouped into large units and thereby intensified. A tune drummed into your ears this way need not be played loud. You sing it to yourself and reinforce the fiddle. If it doesn't drive you insane it will hypnotize you into a rhythmic ecstasy.

The good old barn dance was once quite as wicked as the Charleston is now. It is many decades since the violin was too profane an instrument, from its association with the ungodly dance, to be played in New England churches unless it was held upside down like a cello; but there were towns in Indiana in 1916—Florence Wolford wrote a book about them—where dancing to the fiddle was immoral and only singing games could be played by Christians. The game "Old Dan Tucker" has the same steps and tune as the New England dance of the same name, but virtue was satisfied if the players provided their own music by singing:

Old Dan Tucker's a fine old man,
Washed his face in the frying-pan,
Combed his hair with a wagon wheel,
And died with a toothache in his heel.

Get out of the way of Old Dan Tucker,
He's too late to get his supper,
Supper's over and breakfast's cooking,
Old Dan Tucker's out a-looking.

Some consistent souls, however, saw the resemblance between the game "Weevily Wheat" and the evil Virginia Reel. Their daughters left the floor when "Weevily Wheat" was played. No wonder, when the song had such dangerous lines as these:

The higher up the cherry tree,
The riper grow the cherries;
The more you hug and kiss the girls
The sooner they will marry.

Take a lady by her hand,
Lead her like a pigeon,
Make her dance the weevily wheat,
She loses her religion.

Percy Grainger has made concert music out of the Irish reel "Molly on the Shore," out of "Shepherds Hey," and other folk dances. American composers are beginning to take the hint. Some one has used the "Arkansas Traveller" as theme for a piano composition. If he did it well he must have produced something thoroughly American, with the salty, grotesque humor of the original emphasized and enhanced. Another composer has done a similar job with "Old Zip Coon," which somehow got itself rechristened "Turkey in the Straw." And there are plenty of good subjects left; the "Spitfire" played for the dance "Beaus of Albany"; the "Quinardo Hornpipe," "Jefferson and Liberty," "Soldier's Joy." It is obvious to object that some of the old American reels came from Ireland and England and Scotland. A few of them came bodily, with the tune intact, as British as "America"; and some of these, unlike "America," kept their old names; others have been modified until they are as native as anything not red Indian.

Is France Going Fascist?

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, January 12

THE new parliamentary session has begun in circumstances that cannot be called happy. Since the beginning of last year France has had in succession four governments and six ministers of finance, and the position of the fourth government and sixth finance minister is far from secure. The franc, which stood at about 18 to the dollar at the beginning of last year, now stands at nearly 27, and no solution of the financial problem is in sight. Every politician with any claim to authority on the subject has his own solution, but none has the courage to propose the first and most essential condition of solution—the stabilization of the franc. For there is no French politician with the courage to face the opposition of certain powerful interests hostile to stabilization, the risk of being obliged for the purpose of stabilization to fall back on the sacred gold reserve of the Bank of France (which at present serves no purpose), or the unpopularity that he might incur in consequence of the economic crisis and the rise in prices that would inevitably follow stabilization.

In reality the French people themselves are more responsible than their politicians for the present situation, the ultimate cause of which is their unwillingness to pay direct taxes or to accept disagreeable but necessary measures. If a minister of finance proposes either, he is promptly overthrown by a Chamber susceptible to popular feeling. What was the real origin of the unpopularity that M. Caillaux so long enjoyed, if not the fact that he was the author of the income tax and that his income-tax law in its original form, before it was hacked to pieces by the Senate, would have made the income tax a reality? M. Caillaux's experiences were not such as to encourage any successor to follow his example. Few men, however, are willing to admit that they are responsible for their own misfortunes, and the French least of all. So, after having made it clear to their politicians that, if they seriously try to put the national finances in order they will do so at the risk of their political career if not of their liberty, the French people put all the blame on the politicians and the parliamentary system.

It is fashionable at present in France to declare that the parliamentary system is played out and in various quarters—fundamentally opposed to one another in other respects—there is talk of a dictatorship. Since the public became familiar with the famous dictatorship of the proletariat the word "dictatorship," which really means the arbitrary rule of one man, has been used in a very loose sense. It has come to mean any form of unconstitutional government. So the other day a French Socialist orator called on his comrades to establish the dictatorship of the Socialist Party on the ground that, if they did not, a Fascist dictatorship would forestall them.

This sort of talk has perhaps been taken rather too seriously in other countries. I gather that many people believe a Fascist or some other kind of upheaval to be imminent in France. I confess that I see no signs of it. The present political fashion is no new one. There has always been anti-parliamentarism in France, both on the extreme Right and on the extreme Left, so long as I can remember, and whenever things do not go well people talk as they are talking now. There is some justification for French anti-parliamentarism. The parliamentary machine has never worked well in France partly because the system of two houses with equal powers is unworkable, more, perhaps, because it requires for its satisfactory working a genuine party system, which France does not yet possess. "En France," said an eminent Frenchman once to me, "il n'y a pas de partis politiques. Il n'y a que des clientèles." [In France there are no political parties. There are only factions.] It would pass the wit of man to define the precise shade of difference in principle that separates each of the ten groups into which the Chamber is divided from every other group. The system works in a vicious circle. Because there are so many groups a French government is usually a sort of political menagerie composed of specimens of each species. And the multiplicity of groups arises from this method of forming a government. A Deputy who would have no chance of office on his own merits becomes immediately ministre if he forms a group—a clientèle—and has a score of votes at his disposal.

The funny thing is that, whenever an attempt is made to develop a genuine party system by methods accepted in England as a matter of course, it is denounced as an outrage on the first principles of parliamentary government. If a party expels a member who has put himself up as candidate for some office in opposition to the candidate of his own party and had himself elected by the votes of its opponents, the Temps gets up on its hind legs and lectures the party for its shocking intolerance. If a party meets to decide on what conditions it will join or support a government, or draws up a definite political program, or objects to the inclusion of its political opponents in a Cabinet supposed to be composed of its friends, it is denounced for substituting the rule of "clubs and coteries" for that of Parliament and accused of trying to "exclude Republicans from the Republic." It would be considered quite natural by at least half the French press that, if two members of the present English Cabinet resigned, Mr. Baldwin should replace them by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, and very wicked on the part of Mr. Baldwin's colleagues in the Cabinet to object.

This being so, I consider it premature to say that the parliamentary system has failed in France, for it has yet to be tried. Nevertheless, this is not recognized by the French public, and perhaps if the present parliamentary chaos continues the French people may sooner or later become exasperated and try something else, but that does not seem to me at all likely in the near future. When one remembers how many abuses much more intimately affecting their daily lives than any political shortcomings the French have patiently endured for generations while swearing at them all the time, one is inclined to think that it may be some time yet before the point of exasperation is reached. I do not ignore the fact that changes in France are usually made by revolutions, because they are rarely made by reforms, and that, when the extraordinary patience of the French is at last exhausted they have a habit of smashing up everything; but at present they do not seem to me to be in the mood for a revolution either on the Right or on the Left.

French dictatorships in the past have been associated with military glory. Napoleon III, it is true, had no glory of his own, but he profited by his name and the tradition attached to it. The poor man's obligation to live up to the name and the tradition, in defiance of all his natural inclinations, brought him to ruin. Since his fall France has once been within an ace of a dictatorship, for it is probable that General Boulanger would have succeeded had he not allowed himself to be bluffed and fled the country. He was a poor creature with as little courage as intelligence and had no glory to his credit, but he talked a lot about it and looked very well prancing about in a cocked hat on a white horse. His chief asset was the appeal to la revanche. But that appeal is finished. France has had la revanche and found it a disillusion. The French are cured of their love of military glory, at any rate for the time being. Far from being in an arrogant mood, they are dispirited and dangerously lack confidence in themselves and their own future. No general is popular or has any prospect of becoming a national hero. There is, it seems to me, not the least chance of a military dictatorship.

Fascism, however, is said to be the danger. The Fascist movement in France, such as it is—and it does not look dangerous at present—is just the old Bonapartism without a Bonaparte or even a plausible substitute for one, for M. Millerand hardly fills the picture. It starts with the disadvantage that it is violently opposed by the Action Française, so that the anti-parliamentary forces of the Right are divided. And how is a Fascist coup to be brought about? By the army? I very much doubt whether the army could be depended on for such a purpose, even if the generals could be. Nearly twenty years ago the 17th Regiment refused to fire on the revolting wine-growers of the South, although the orders came from the legal government. Such an incident might happen again, especially if the orders came from the authors of an unconstitutional movement for upsetting the legal government. Conscripts object to firing on the civilian population.

I also doubt whether the methods employed by the Italian Fascists during their long preparation for the march on Rome would succeed in France. The French may be patient, but they are also pugnacious, and they would not quietly submit to be murdered and plundered without resisting, as did the more pacific Italians. If the French Fascists began burning down trade-union offices, forcibly expelling municipal councils, and raiding private houses to carry off their occupants, they might easily get the worst of it. Moreover, the Italian Fascists had the King on their side and a government too weak or too complaisant to interfere with them.

I doubt whether French Fascists would have the support of M. Doumergue or whether it would help them much, if they had. They might have a complaisant government but, in my opinion, an attempt to imitate the tactics of the Italian Fascists in France, if not at once repressed by the government, would lead to a civil war, the result of which might easily be unfavorable to the Fascists.

There remains the suggestion of an American newspaper that the Chamber might be dissolved and not reelected. According to the newspaper in question, M. Doumergue is quite ready to take that course. Again I doubt it. I doubt still more whether, as was suggested, the Senate would at once agree to a dissolution of the Chamber for that purpose, if M. Briand or M. Poincaré asked for it. The Senate may be conservative, but it is staunchly republican and constitutionalist, and the Senators would have a shrewd suspicion that they would be the next victims.

Any kind of dictatorship seems to me unlikely in France unless and until there is a man with the temper and qualities of a dictator and the necessary popularity. So far as I can see there is no such man either among the generals or the politicians, or anywhere. Italy had a Mussolini. France has not even a Boulanger. The two leading figures in French politics not definitely on the Left are M. Briand and M. Poincaré. M. Briand has a certain popularity, although he has not the hold on the public that he has on Parliament, but nothing could be more alien from his temperament than a dictatorship. He is persuasive, diplomatic, accommodating—a master in the art of reconciling irreconcilables—but he does not remotely resemble a dictator and can hardly have the smallest inclination to play such a part. M. Poincaré has perhaps more inclination, but he does not seem to me to have the qualifications. He is first and foremost a lawyer with a rigidly legal mind and has very little perception. Did not M. Clemenceau once say that he knew everything and understood nothing? Besides, M. Poincaré is not a bit popular and in fact never was. No Lorrainer is ever really popular in France. A French dictator should come from the South. Napoleon was more Italian than French, with the histrionic side to his character that is typically Italian, which a dictator needs in France as in Italy. To use the French term, he was something of a cabotin, as a genius can be. His nephew, who was not a genius, was even more of one and Boulanger was nothing else. There remains M. Millerand, who is positively unpopular and seems to me to be, as Bismarck did not say of Lord Salisbury, a lathe painted to look like iron. Were M. Clemenceau a little younger and had he retained his hold on the popular imagination, I should say that he was the most likely man in France to pull off a dictatorship, but of course he is now out of the question. Apart from his age, it is amazing to see how completely the old Tiger has been forgotten.

On the whole, I should say that an unconstitutional movement on the Left might have more chance than one on the Right. If a Socialist Government were in office it might, if it wished, be able to resort to unconstitutional methods with success, at least for a time. But a Socialist Government is unlikely to be in office and if there were one it would be strictly constitutional. My belief is that the French will just continue to muddle along.

A Student Factory Hand

By MARGARET LINDSAY SUTHERLAND

[This essay has been awarded the first prize of $125 in The Nation's Student-Worker Contest as announced last week. Three prizes were offered to university and college students for accounts of their summer at work in some industrial or agricultural occupation. The second prize of $75 was won by Robert Leeper of Allegheny College, and the third prize of $25 by A. George Purdue of Yale University. For reasons of space some portions of Miss Sutherland's narrative are here omitted.]

"SAY, dearie!"

I smiled as I turned to the neighbor who addressed me. It was my third day in the employment office. The first day I had been ignored; the second I was addressed with a comradely "girlie"; today I was one of them. All of us were hunting jobs and reduced to the common denominator of unemployment, we were friends, almost buddies.

"You're new at this, ain't you?" the woman went on.

"Yes, kind of," I said. Certainly I looked the part I was trying to assume. I thought my bargain-basement clothes were correct to the last detail, even to the fat powder puff I carried in my hand-bag. And I spoke very little. My voice had not marked me as an alien.

"Are you past the age limit?" she asked. So that was it. Most factory girls of my age looked very much older. I had observed that fact in the two days I had spent going from factory door to factory door asking for a job, after unsuccessful mornings at the public employment-bureau. The age limit in the State was sixteen. Any girls below the age limit who wished to work had to secure a certificate.

"Oh, yes."

"How long you been tryin' to get a job?" she asked.

"About a week. And you?"

"Me? I been out o' work some time now. There's too many young girls in the summer-time. We old hands have to wait our turn." The stalls of the employment office, like the factories, seemed to hold middle-aged women or very young girls.

"You oughtn't to be in here askin' for an unskilled job, girlie. A young girl like you, too. Listen, here dearie," and my new friend leaned over the lap of a Norwegian woman sitting between us, "you ain't never goin' to git a job by tellin' the truth. You got to lie like they do to git a job. See?" That was, it proved, the soundest advice I got. When my summons came I went up to the desk where the woman in charge of our stall sat with one hand over the mouthpiece of the telephone.

"Any experience in die-cutting?" she asked. It sounded too difficult, even in the face of my late advice, so I shook my head. "Then I don't believe I'll have anything else today, unless you'll take housework." I told her that I had tried that, but did not like it. I went back to the stall. It was no use to wait around any longer. I had already learned that there is only one hour a day in which to apply for jobs and that is between seven and eight in the morning. I stood leaning against the wall listening to the chatter. I felt more at home there than any place in the city.

"Where you goin' now?" asked a woman with a tangled plume in her hat that had once been someone's finery.

"I don't know. Home, I guess."

"Do you want to go over to the pay-employment office across the street with me? There ain't no business here today. Never is at the end of the week. We can get swell jobs over there." I agreed. On the way over she told me the system of the pay-employment agencies. You tell them what kind of job you want and give them $6.

"Yes, it's right high," said my friend with the plume. "But sometimes we think it's a sight better'n no job."

We filled out an application, very much like the one in the public office. It asked age at leaving school, number of dependents, former employers, and other things I had to lie about. The man said he had a good job in a box factory for me. He asked for $6. But I objected.

"I don't even know where it is. It might not be convenient to work there." He said he could not give me the address. However, he did mention the street.

"And what if I don't like the job?" I asked.

"That ain't our business, lady. Of course, if there is any real good reason for you wantin' to leave you can write the bureau within three days and we'll get you another job. If they fire you before three days are up we'll get you another, too." There was something obnoxious about getting a job at an agency that is supported by the very people who on account of their desperate straits must patronize it. Besides, I hadn't $6. I left the lady of the plume to get a job.

I went immediately to a directory and found that there was only one box factory on the street the man had named. After riding for forty-five minutes on two different surface cars I reached the street. It was a street of small stores. And on the second floor of one of the smallest, dingiest shops there was nailed a board with the name of the factory upon it. I only saw it from the outside, for I did not apply.

The following morning there was an advertisement in the paper for experienced olive packers. It sounded easy. I was still busily fabricating my story as I walked up and down in front of the factory waiting for the doors to open. There were one or two sleepy-eyed girls ahead of me, and the line behind me was getting longer every moment.

A man at the entrance was the first to question us. I said that I was experienced, and named a factory that was unknown except to me. He sent away several undesirable-looking girls and women and the rest of us were admitted and sent to the fifth floor. The elevator stopped by the olive packers, fortunately. They worked rapidly, fitting the olives into impossible places with chopsticks. And the nice red stuffing was always on the outside! I was panic-stricken. I forgot the name of my fictitious factory and all my experience by the time the forewoman reached us. I was just a factory girl out of work when she spoke to me. But she employed me, saying she needed girls.

Those of us that she "took on" were taken to the office. The forelady—the word "forewoman" is not used outside textbooks on factories—gave us long applications to fill out. They were the most formidable questionnaires that I had yet encountered. They asked, among other things, for references, five former employers, father's name and business, and personal debts. In return for all that information we were told that we would work for nine hours and a half a day at $13 a week.

In factory uniforms of white caps and long aprons, we were put to work ladling jam. The whole fifth floor of the packing plant was used for making jams and jellies. Great vats holding half-ton lots of strawberry preserves were surrounded by big copper kettles in which the jam was cooked. The cooking was done with steam and the air was heavy with the odors of hot preserves. White-coated men ran back and forth with kettles of boiling jam that sizzled when they were put in the water trough to cool. The released steam filled the factory with a roar that sounded like a roundhouse. The forelady's voice was shrill and nasal above the noise:

"A little faster, there, girlie. You have to learn to work fast here or we don't want you."

But if the forelady was unnecessarily abrupt my immediate boss was very kind. The girl who had charge of the "gang" I worked with was an intelligent colored girl named Roxie. I was apprenticed to her to learn my job. At first she exercised her authority over me by ordering me to pick up her towel when she dropped it and to wipe the jam up from around the kettle where she stood. But gradually we became friends, and before I left she had released me from her tyranny and I had overcome in part my Mason-Dixon prejudice against her orders. The Negro girls were the pleasantest of all the girls to work with, for they were tireless and almost always happy.

My particular job was to ladle the jam into bottles. Other girls in the gang brought up fresh bottles, put tops on, filled bottles, operated the vacuum-capping machines, and packed the bottles in great iron baskets for the sterilizer. The ladles were heavy and clumsily made of copper. The jam was hot and with every dipperful I got fresh burns on my bare arms. By noon my hands were blistered and every muscle rebelled against its particular use. The afternoon was interminable. But Roxie was kind.

"Say, you ain't much used to work, is you, honey? Here you, Winnie, take this girl's place while she rests a spell." I sat down on a box. Roxie brought me up with a start. "You can't set down, child. Don't you never let the boss ketch you settin' down if you want to keep your job. Now you load the bottles onto that truck awhile to rest you." Bending, carrying, dipping, loading. There was jam in our eyebrows and in our shoes. The steam was stifling. Toward the end of the day, and all the days were alike, the noise and the steam and the pain merged into a dull confusion in my mind that was like taking an anaesthetic. And through it all came that sharp voice of authority like the crack of a whip, and the tired eyes of the girls. They joked and fought and were quiet in turn. Day in and day out.

It was several days later that I incurred the displeasure of my forelady. It was the beginning of the end. We were working on a machine that the girls called the "strawberry hell-cat," which automatically filled the bottles with jam as they came around the tread with a diabolical regularity. We were the servants of the machine. We had to adapt our irregular motions to its stern regularity. We had to feed it fresh bottles, even up the filled ones as they came around, and put them on the belt that took them to the capping machine. To relax one moment meant a broken bottle and a scolding from the forelady.

When two experienced "cappers" hurt their hands in the machine Roxie gave me a chance to try it. It worked with a foot pedal, but it required a certain deftness to take one bottle out and put one in simultaneously without catching a hand in the machinery. The belt that brought the bottles down to the machine was built into a movable table, and the strange thing was that the girl at the capping machine stood with her back to the belt and the bottles were fed to her on the left side. It was very awkward. I suppose we broke thirty bottles a day knocking them off with our elbows. We stood on planks to be above the jam sea-level. Just such a pile of broken bottles and strawberry jam attracted the foreman's attention. He asked how it happened. I explained it:

"It's the machine, sir. The bottles come up on the left side and we knock them off with our elbows. I don't think we'd break them if the belt were changed over to the other side." He was interested enough to stand in my place to try it. He called the machinist over, when the forelady walked up. He was the floor manager, but he was also her husband. She asked what it was all about. "Listen," she said, "that new girl thinks she knows just a little too much. We've been here for nine months now, and that machine was good enough up till today, and it's good enough for you, even. You're just tryin' to cook up excuses to stop work for a few minutes. Now get back to work all of you." I was punished for my interference by having to scrub the jam off the machines the rest of the time I worked there, and it was a loathsome job.

I had several disagreements with the forelady in the next few days and I learned a strange thing from it. The women who have grown old in the factory heartily resent any opposition to the power that aged them. I learned it from one experience. I had been fishing little pieces of brown pineapple out of pineapple preserves as I stood at a table that came to my knees. The jars were too heavy to lift; the table too low to bend over. So I pulled up a box and sat down. I did better work and I worked faster sitting down. The forelady appeared and yelled—she never spoke—at me to get up. And she kicked the box from under me half way across the floor. I felt like a character from Dickens and at the idea I smiled. The woman drew back her arm to strike me, but instead she said that I was too damned fresh and she had had just about enough of me.

When she had gone I looked for sympathy from the older women about the table. I got none. I got several I-told-you-so looks. The young girls loved it. A little Hungarian girl fourteen years old cried joyously that the forelady had not said "damn" since February. The young girls were not yet broken. They were very sympathetic the next day when I got fired. It was hard to leave them, especially as I was fired along with a half-witted woman whose face twitched.

It was for the girls that I went to the manager of the factory. I said I was a college girl; that perhaps he would be interested in hearing an employee's point of view about his factory. He drew himself up proudly:

"I don't think there's anything you can tell me about this here factory that I don't know. I've been in a lot of factories and I've never saw one better run than this." And he added as he walked away, "You're not going to get your job back no matter what you have to say." Never again during the two months did I attempt the part of the reformer. I remained a spectator.

Factory workers as a whole never know the name of any of the factory officials, for the only one that concerns them is their immediate superior.

If a girl says, "You'll like this factory," it usually means that she is fond of her forelady. I heard that remark in the next factory I got a job in. Still adhering to the advice of the woman in the employment office I was employed at $14 a week doing "fancy packing" in a candy factory. I claimed to have worked in a retail store for two years packing candy.

The factory was large and refrigerated to a degree that made goose-flesh on our arms. We worked at great long tables packing about sixty boxes of candy at once from a pattern box. Young Italian boys ran up and down the aisles with fresh trays of candy in answer to frenzied cries of "marshmallows," "car'mels, Tony, hurry!" and "three-cornered raspberry." For ten hours a day we stood at our tables, slipped candy into little frilled cups, and packed it into tight boxes. The monotony was broken only by the half-hour lunch period. The afternoon was six hours and a half long.

The hours were longer than in the other factory, the work was more monotonous if not so hard, and there was not even the convenience of a washroom; yet there was a difference. And the difference was Josephine. Josephine was our forelady and beloved of all. She, too, had been a factory girl, even as Mrs. O'Brien of the jam factory, but Josephine remembered it. She was gay and friendly. She told the girls funny stories, usually vulgar. They adored her.

The second day I worked in the factory I became one of Josephine's staunchest admirers. In the morning I dropped a tray of candy and it rolled like marbles. I waited for the abuse I was used to. But Josephine called, "Don't mind that, girlie. It's a little hard to begin with, isn't it?" In the afternoon the girls ordered a great basket of flowers for her eighth wedding anniversary. They left their tables and crowded around Josephine while she unwrapped them. When she opened their card she hesitated a moment between crying and laughing, and said simply:

"Ah, girls, what did you do it fer?"

I was apprenticed for the first few days to a young Bohemian girl who was more of a tyrant than Roxie was. I did most of her work for her and a little of my own. She was very contemptuous of the girls about her because they spent their pay on themselves. She had to give hers unopened to her father, but she clothed her necessity as a virtue and gloried in it. She was working hard to "get on piece-work," for after the first month the girls were recommended for piece-work, and they could make as much as $25 a week if they were good. (At least an Italian woman who had worked there eight years made that much, and all the girls hoped to.) Her father, who had worked for three years on a furnace in some factory, made $19 a week, and she wanted to make more than he did. The two of them supported a family of six.

At the end of my first week I was given a number for my boxes and a table to myself. The Italian woman who had been there eight years worked beside me. She had four children and a husband to support and she labored at a speed that left no room for casual visiting. The piece-workers had a speed mania that betided woe to him who stepped in their way. Rosa swore at me more than once in her native language and once or twice in mine. She stole everything I left around, even if it was tin foil that we wrapped the candy in.

was late summer and the factory hands who had migrated during the summer had come home to find schoolgirls in their places. The employment offices were filled. The only advertisements were those for "Bonnaz operators" and "stitchers." When a big publishing house put an ad in the paper for fifteen girls two hundred and fifty of us answered it. I was one of the first girls there before seven. When the office opened at eight there were perhaps a hundred and fifty. By nine we were a fighting, pushing mob, two hundred and fifty strong. In competition there is little of camaraderie. It was a grim battle. I was not an outsider trying to see what industry was like. I was one of them, and I felt that my next meal depended on the outcome of that ordeal. When, at 10:30, I reached the inner office of the employment manager and she hired me I was elated. This time I was chosen because I claimed to have had two years of high school. The employment manager boasted that almost every girl in the factory had had an eighth-grade education.

My new job was that of book-inspector. I was in the bindery, hidden from the world by a mountain of books waiting to be inspected on one side and a mountain of books that had been inspected on the other. For nine hours and a half I sat behind my walls and looked through books for imperfections. After the first week I averaged sixty books an hour, not without aching eyes.

After two pure-food factories I was working in the first factory that provided soap and towels. For fingerprints show on paper! In this factory we sat down. After sitting down the first morning for several hours I pushed back the stool and stood up. A red-haired forelady, hideously painted, swooped down on me and began without any preliminaries: "Trying to do things different from everybody else, are you? What do you think those chairs are for? To look at? And watch I don't catch you standing up again." And so after six weeks of enforced standing I was reprimanded for not sitting down. It was not the worker that was considered. It was the article we manufactured.

"How do you like it here?" I asked a girl working next me.

"Not much, I been here three years and only got one raise. And look at Katie over there, she's been here six—she's only twenty now. Looks older, don't she? Well, she started out on nine a week and she don't get but eighteen after six years. They're tight, here." I made friends with Katie several days after that. It was difficult, for we were not allowed to talk during working hours. I asked her why she had stayed so long. She shrugged her little round shoulders.

"Oh, I like it all right and you never know when you're goin' to get in a worse place. Beside, I might not find any job, and then where'd I be?"

"Have you really been here since you were fourteen?" I asked.

"Sure. Why? Who told you? I ain't missed more'n two weeks altogether since I come, either." There was pride in her voice and loyalty. The same loyalty that I had discovered at the candy factory when I left. They were friends of mine until I left, but they had no use for me when I talked of leaving. For six years, a girl of twenty had only seen the world after six o'clock in the evening. Loyalty! And yet, even I had left each factory reluctantly. I loathed some of their methods, but I had known the girls and the women and liked them. Perhaps it was loyalty to human contact.

The World Court—"A Polite Gesture"

By S. O. LEVINSON

THE proponents of the World Court have been driven to take two positions inconsistent with each other and leading to an anomalous result. In the first place they are seeking to hold Republican votes by attempting to demonstrate that the Court is not a subsidiary of the League. Proof of this is necessary to enable the Republican Party to carry water on both shoulders, as its platform pledges it to go into the Court and at the same time to have nothing to do with the League. This demagogic distinction must be upheld or the Republicans may have to swallow political poison. Now, it is a plain evasion of substantial truth to say that one has a contract with the Illinois Steel Company, a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation, and yet has no legal relation to the United States Steel Corporation. It is equally evasive to say that we go into a Court created under Article 14 of the League, whose statute was prepared at the direction of the Council, which struck out at least two of Mr. Root's best provisions, and yet contend that the Court and the League are entirely separate institutions. Now, if the Court has a legal relation to the League, which it manifestly has, including parentage, and if the United States goes into the Court, it logically and inevitably follows that the United States will have a genuine relationship with the League.

In order to maintain plausibly that no relationship is created the Court advocates contend that there is a clear difference between the members composing the League acting as individual states and the same states acting officially as members of the League. They contend that the Court was created by the units of individual states that constitute the League and not by the same states acting as members of the League. There is an important published case, with which I was connected, where policy-holders sought to recover a large sum of money paid personally to the manager of their insurance company for aiding in the transfer of its policies to another company. The directors of the selling company were put on the witness stand and claimed that they knew nothing about the payment of moneys to the manager officially as directors, but knew it only in their individual capacity. Suffice it to say the court entered a decree compelling the restitution of the money.

Forced by political necessity to make this scholastic refinement and to take the position that the Court is independent of the League, the question of "sanctions" compels friends of the Court to take a second position which utterly confutes the first. Senator Walsh, with characteristic candor, discloses the second contention. He writes The Nation:

That a nation which belongs to the League may find itself in some embarrassment by virtue of certain provisions of the Covenant should a decision of the Court go against it may be true.

The "embarrassment" arises from the effect of the second contention, namely, that a member of the League cannot divest itself of League-commitments even when signing a court protocol which it is claimed is independent of the League. These two contentions cannot stand together; united they fall. If the League and the Court are independent of each other and created by separate treaties, then it is strange that a member of the League suffers an "embarrassment" from which a non-member is free. As the first proposition of the pro-Courters is necessary in order to hold Republican votes, the second is designed to prevent the adoption of reservations against the use of "sanctions" or legal war by the Council. Let us follow the scholastic trail to its anomalous end.

If the United States adheres to the Court without safeguards against "sanctions," it thereby recognizes the power and right in the Council to administer "sanctions" in at least all cases where League members are involved. If, then, a controversy between a European state and a Latin-American state, both members of the League, is submitted and judgment is rendered against the Latin-American state, we have by acquiescence confirmed the power of the Council to enforce this judgment by war against the Latin-American state, no matter what questions may be involved. Shall we thus, incidentally, permit the Monroe Doctrine to be exposed to collateral attack?

Next, suppose there is submitted to the Court a dispute between the United States, a non-member, and, say, France, a member of the League. If the United States wins, it seems the Council, under this second contention, will have the power of physical enforcement against France because the judgment is against a member of the League; but if the judgment is against the United States, a non-member, the Council cannot enforce the judgment. Isn't it a poor rule that doesn't work both ways? And will a member of the League thus handicapped be willing to submit a major dispute with a non-member? If this contention is upheld it is obvious that a premium will be put upon staying out of the League, because all members of the League will be at a decided disadvantage in submitting disputes with non-members to the Court. No such result by construction could stand or should stand; it is unilateral, inequitable, and unworkable.

Sooner or later the Court will be called upon, probably by an advisory opinion, to construe the reservations and all the papers and documents connected therewith. It is almost judicially inconceivable that the Court would give an interpretation so anomalous in character and one which would work such manifest injustice to members of the League. It is the settled province of courts to decide what is the legal effect of instruments and statutes. If, in the opinion of the Court, our resolution of adherence does in fact create legal relationship to the League, a reservation stating that no such relationship is created thereby is of no effect. Powers can be limited by clear declarations, but the courts control the interpretation and construction of documents. For example, where parties to a business contract attempt by a statement to declare that the contract does not create a partnership, the court says to the parties that it is the sole prerogative of the court to decide that question. Here, then, we see that the effort to maintain two inconsistent positions leads to absurd results, and also leaves the rights and obligations of the United States with respect to the Court uncertain and undecided.

The real answer to The Nation's recent question concerning sanctions is given by Senator Walsh in his letter when he says:

Your proposition really, then, is, as I view it, that we do not go into the Court at all, since you attach a condition that it is known in advance will not be met.

This, of course, means that the Council will not tolerate any interference with its control over "sanctions." This is overwhelmingly so because one of the main purposes of the League was to give a small number of states within the Council control over war and thereby over the world. So long as that power is preempted by the League, the United States should enter none of its portals. Unless and until the Council is willing to give up its theory of coercion and control, of sanctions and war, it would be a betrayal of world peace to enter into a limited partnership with the League through the medium of the Court. For even the advocates of the Court are now tempering their approval of the tribunal. For two years a veritable crusade has been conducted throughout the country, representing to our people that the Court was a great instrument of peace and a genuine remedy for war. By means of this exhortation hundreds of resolutions were obtained favoring adherence and symbolizing irresistible public opinion. Now in the Senate its friends admit that the Court is "but a feeble, halting step toward peace," "a polite gesture," a balm to the injured sensibilities of Europe. Thus the only possible justification for a departure from the faith of the fathers, the goal of abolition of war, is altogether lacking.

The University of North Carolina Gets Its Orders

By NELL BATTLE LEWIS

THE University of North Carolina has got its orders from the cotton manufacturers of that State and has accepted them without protest. The manufacturers have peremptorily told the university to "stick to its knitting," and not to forget its "proper function" so far as to make a study of the textile industry in North Carolina, thus "breeding radicals and reformers." Such a study was recently proposed by the university's Institute for Research in Social Science in conjunction with its Department of Commerce. It was to have been one of eight studies of various aspects of the State's life planned by the university and made possible by a three-year donation of $97,000 from the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial Fund. In regard to the object of the study, officials of the institute had said:

Publicists and mill men alike have tended to present their views as extremes. In all likelihood, somewhere between the extremes lies the truth which only the unbiased investigator can discover and present with authority. The Institute for Research in Social Science begs to offer its services in this role. Its sole interest is to discover the truth and make that truth available not only for North Carolina but also for the entire South.

A condensed outline of the proposed study shows its purposes to have been:

1. To show statistically the extent to which mill operatives move about.
2. To prove or disprove the charge of lack of leadership in mill population.
3. To compare the general moral status of the mill group with other groups of population.
4. To work out, on a thorough and scientific basis, a cost of living study in mill villages.
5. To show statistically the efficiency of welfare schemes by collecting facts, over a period of time, from various kinds of mills.
6. To make the results of such studies available for the use of manufacturers and students in general in the form of books, pamphlets, and articles for the press.

This outline, in fuller form, together with a request for permission to make the study was sent by the institute to the North Carolina Cotton Manufacturers' Association at its recent meeting at Pinehurst. Whereupon the members of the association unanimously adopted a resolution in which permission was bluntly refused and the study declared to be "neither important nor necessary." One reason for this refusal, it was reported, was the manufacturers' displeasure because of an article which had appeared in the Journal of Social Forces, published by the University of North Carolina. This article described a survey of the children in two mill schools in the State. The representative of the university was denied opportunity to appear before the board of the manufacturers' association at Pinehurst to prevent an appeal for cooperation.

The cotton manufacturers' refusal to disclose to a responsible agency facts about the textile industry in North Carolina was first given general publicity by the Raleigh News and Observer. Two days later the university's unprotesting submission to the manufacturers was shown by a story sent out to the State press by the university's director of publicity, who wrote that university officials would not comment on the mill owners' refusal to allow the study, and that "the university was not planning further steps in connection with the situation." The publicity director continued:

The university's attitude, it is understood, is that since the proposed study has been rejected and that since the mill owners were acting within their legal rights in rejecting the offer, there is nothing for the university to do, unless the mill owners change their attitude.

Apparently not satisfied that the university's submission was complete, David Clark, editor of the Southern Textile Bulletin, reputed to be the organ of the manufacturers and published at Charlotte, North Carolina, gave to the News and Observer a few days later an interview in which he was reported to have said that if the university persisted in carrying through such a study the manufacturers would make their influence felt against the university at the next session of the legislature. According to the News and Observer, Mr. Clark said:

It [the study] will hurt the university. The university will feel it when the next legislature meets. Not only the manufacturers but other business men of the State have expressed the opinion to me that this is outside the university's function, and they will not stand for it.

"Mr. Clark expressed no doubt," the interview continued, "that the manufacturers can and will cause the legislature to cut the appropriation of the university if they persisted in making studies unwelcome to them."

Two days later Mr. Clark denied having said this, but as the accuracy and integrity of the reporter who wrote the interview are well known, the News and Observer refused to accept Mr. Clark's denial. Previously Mr. Clark had declared editorially in the Southern Textile Bulletin that the study by the university was "but another attack of our enemies" and had added:

The business meeting turned down unanimously the request of representatives of the University of North Carolina to be allowed to make what they call a "study" of the cotton manufacturing industry. There was no mistaking the idea of the manufacturers that the university should stick to its knitting and not engage in the pastime of breeding radicals and reformers.

In another editorial in the Bulletin Mr. Clark had written:

We have from time to time had something to say about outside activities of colleges and are becoming firmly convinced that such activities are a real menace.

We believe that a college should attend strictly to the education of young men and we can see no good reason for outside activities and investigations.

The country is sick unto death of federal bureaus, without having the added burden of bureaus in every college and university.

It may be the function of a college to investigate the social and economic evils of its State and set the student upon the problem of curing such evils; but we fail to see why it should be considered a college or a university function, and we know that such investigations breed radicals.

The same editorial expressed considerable agitation in regard to what Mr. Clark called "bolshevism in the colleges."

North Carolina leads the South in the manufacture of cotton, and for the month of November, 1925, reported more spindle hours than Massachusetts. Competition with New England mills is very keen. Cotton mill operatives in North Carolina are not unionized, labor is cheaper than in the North, and working hours for children are long. So far, the cotton manufacturers of the State have been in complete control of the North Carolina General Assembly. A bill for an eight-hour child-labor law, sponsored by the North Carolina Legislative Council of Women in the General Assembly of 1925, was overwhelmingly defeated, receiving only one vote in committee. A study of conditions among women employed in North Carolina cotton mills, which the North Carolina League of Women Voters last year requested the State Child Welfare Commission to make and which the commission authorized, was never made. The excuse given was lack of funds.

At the last session of the North Carolina Legislature the cotton manufacturers were at no pains to conceal their hand. The present Governor came into office on a program of economy. During the 1925 session he favored a bill consolidating the State Board of Charities and Public Welfare and the State Child Welfare Commission. The latter has supervision of child labor in North Carolina, but the county superintendents of public welfare help to enforce the child-labor law and there is much overlapping of work by the two agencies. The Board of Charities and Public Welfare is the State agency most free from political control. Its head, Mrs. Kate Burr Johnson, lobbied for the eight-hour child-labor law and is noted in the State for her honesty and courage. Under the proposed plan of consolidation enforcement of the child-labor law would have been under her direction. A few hours after the consolidation bill was drawn the legislators were flooded with telegrams from excited cotton manufacturers opposing the bill. Pressure by the manufacturers was so strong that the Governor withdrew his support and the bill was not introduced.

There is no phase of the life of North Carolina about which less authoritative and unprejudiced information is available than about the textile industry. And as long as the cotton manufacturers have their way this will continue to be the case.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has been reading "Bread and Circuses," by W. E. Woodward, and this week he sits at the feet of the hero, Michael Webb, and listens with respectful attention to America's foremost debunking expert. Michael is talking of poetry and the practical man:

It is really discreditable, in a popular sense, to be a poet in America. Poets are patronized, and looked down upon, and pitied a little. Why? Because, to the American mind the worst of all failings is impracticality; and, of course, poets are considered impractical. . . . At the present time the world needs nothing else quite so badly as about a million impractical people, to take charge of larger operations of all kinds. We are urgently in need of impractical ideas. History has shown that nothing whatever in the way of progress can be expected of practical people. I don't want to run them down unjustly, or take away the credit that rightfully belongs to them. They are excellent at all small and piddling affairs. They can build a very good road, for instance; provided that some impractical dreamer tells them how wide the road ought to be and where it ought to be located.

YET even at building roads Michael goes on to explain the practical man often fails, probably because he thinks of a road merely as such and not of the people who must use it.

What a pity that New York was not laid out by impractical people! It was done by practical men. Now look at the thing—the streets are not wide enough; there are no diagonal streets; and the blocks are all turned in the wrong direction. No dreamer would ever have made such a colossal blunder as that. Practical people are splendid in all minor matters, such as devising the best method of pasting labels on cans, or in selling suspenders, or in running shoe factories at high speed. But in all really big affairs, in matters affecting humanity in the mass, they are always wrong and are sometimes terribly destructive. . . . Such questions should be turned over to impractical men with full power. In my opinion there are no practical solutions for most of the great social questions—and, indeed, I'll include in that the major problems of industry and finance. Yet they have to be solved. You cannot get rid of a problem by admitting that there is no practical solution for it. The practical mind is defeated by them because there is no way of solving them in a practical manner; the only possible solutions are impractical and visionary. Such a dilemma is a hopeless riddle to practical men; they lack imagination; they're soaked in conventional ideas. Everything of great importance is the work of visionaries and dreamers.

* * * * *

THE Drifter, who of course has been taunted from childhood with his lack of practicality, reads on with a glow of content:

The slavery question, as it existed before the Civil War in the United States, shows the failure of the practical mind to handle a problem that lay a little outside its frame. Many plans to do away with slavery were proposed. One was for the government to buy all the slaves and send them back to Africa; another was to buy them and set them free wherever they were, giving each one a bit of land to start him off in life; another was to move all the white people out of the State of Texas and turn that State over to the Negroes, where they could develop into a nation of their own, as a vassal of the United States. These plans were all considered very foolish. They were the ideas of impractical and visionary men. They met with vast, overwhelming, and perfectly logical objections on all sides. In the end the question of slavery was settled by force of arms. That was the practical solution. We know now that even the most visionary and extravagant among the impractical plans proposed before the war would have solved the slavery problem at not more than one fourth the cost of the Civil War, to say nothing of the destruction and the hate.

* * * * *

A WISE man, this Mr. Webb. He might have gone on to comment similarly on common sense, one of the most overruled qualities in the world. But instead he chose to wind up his discourse with a burst of oratory:

All the great heroes of progress have been impractical people. Galileo was a sacrilegious fool; Christ was a peniless tramp; Newton was an absent-minded, addle-headed person; Robert Fulton was a visionary. . . .

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Mr. Hard Is Taken to Task

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wonder if The Nation is not a bit ashamed of Mr. Hard's article, The New World Court, As Tramp (January 13)?

In the first place, Mr. Hard discovers us the perfection of wisdom the so-called Permanent Court of Arbitration established at the first Hague Conference, though it is nothing but a convenient list of names from among whom nations involved in future controversies may perhaps select arbitrators. If this unsuited "Court" is so satisfactory, why does Mr. Hard suppose that Secretary of State Root (whom he quotes approvingly in another connection) instructed our delegates at the second Hague Conference to work for "a permanent tribunal composed of judges who are judicial officers and nothing else, who are paid adequate salaries, who have no other occupation, and who devote their entire time to the trial and decision of international causes by judicial methods and under a sense of judicial responsibility"? Why does he suppose that the second Hague Conference was at such pains to draft a convention for a "fixed bench," failing only to agree on a method of electing the judges? Even Senator Lodge, in a resolution presented to the Senate on May 6, 1924, trotted out a scheme of his own for a "fixed bench" to be elected by the concurrent action of a "General Committee" and a "Special Committee" composed after the pattern of the Assembly and Council of the League respectively.

As for Mr. Hard's reliance on the prophecy of M. Bourgeois in 1899 that "governments would not take important cases" to a "fixed bench," it is sufficient to observe that some twenty nations have already accepted in advance the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice in any future controversy of a justiciable nature, and that France itself signified its willingness to do so coincident with the coming into force of the protocol for the pacific settlement of international disputes.

Mr. Hard says: "The League is the Court's creator and reviser." The League as such has literally nothing to do with amending the statute of the Court. Such amendment can be made only by unanimous consent of all the nations signatory to the separate treaty setting up the Court. Very likely any future conferences of the signatory Powers to consider amendments to the Court statute would be held at Geneva, as a convenient meeting place of the nations, but aside from convenience such a conference might as well be held in Washington, or Tokio, or Rio de Janeiro.

Mr. Hard repeats the obstinate misconception that if the Senate ratifies the proposal to adhere to the Court statute, the United States will "sit on the Court"; the American judge who happens now to be on the bench will "represent the United States." This is a favorite expression of Senator Borah, which led him to come out a rather pathetic second best in a recent colloquy with Senator Walsh on the floor of the Senate. Mr. Hard might have taken warning from that. (See 67 Congressional Record, No. 12, page 803.) It is precisely as loose and inaccurate to say that the United States would be "sitting on the Court" in the person of Judge Moore as to say that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is sitting on the Supreme Court in the person of Mr. Justice Holmes.

It is this same misconception which leads Mr. Hard to suppose that the United States will be under some sort of obligation to enforce the decisions of the Court "which we in the Court have helped to hand down." With reference to the suggestion of Mr. Hard that "under Article 13 of the League's Covenant, the League has the duty of enforcing the decisions of the new Court," it is sufficient to observe that under that same article the League has the duty of enforcing the decisions of the old Permanent Court of Arbitration which the United States is already a party to supporting. Not being a member of the League, and disavowing any obligations under its Covenant, we would have no more obligation to "enforce" a judgment of the Permanent Court of International Justice than we now have to enforce a judgment of the Permanent Court of Arbitration which is no obligation at all.

As to the bugaboo of advisory opinions, Mr. Hard quotes an isolated sentence from Mr. Root, without mentioning that Mr. Root is a staunch supporter of the pending resolution to adhere to the Court statute. He quotes an old expression of John Bassett Moore, hostile to advisory opinions, without having the fairness to set forth Judge Moore's considerably revised view after a few years of actual experience with the advisory opinion. The Court does not act as "attorney" for the League; its advisory opinions, confined to questions proper for judicial determination, are rendered in open court, after full argument by all interested parties. As Judge Moore says, the rules established by the Court in giving advisory opinions "assimilate the process as far as possible to a judicial proceeding, and exclude any supposition that advisory opinions may be rendered in a diplomatic sense and without publicity."

One must give the opponents of the Court credit for shrewdness in the tactics they have adopted. They know the American people can't concentrate on any one topic for very long without becoming bored. They know that if they beat the tom-toms long enough, if they continue to put forth extravagant and lurid distortions of the Court proposal, the public mind will be overcome with bewilderment, which is the precursor of boredom. And they expect the World Court to be lost in that ennui.

Ethics Among Historians

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue for December 23 Dr. Worthington C. Ford, in reviewing Professor E. D. Adams's "Great Britain and the American Civil War," comments on the use made by Professor Adams of material gathered from public and private English sources by the late Charles Francis Adams for a life of his father, United States minister to Great Britain 1861-1868, and adds: "Professor Adams does not state in his preface how he secured a right to use this material for his own purpose," and "it is known that he did not first ask and obtain permission of the owner of this material—the Adams family."

I do not write in a controversial spirit, Mr. Ford having been for many years one of my best friends and of course incapable of intentional injustice. But I feel impelled, as cognizant of some of the facts, to say a few words in the interest of a more complete understanding of the matter.

It should be premised that the biography of the elder C. F. Adams originally planned was to consist of three volumes. Charles Francis Adams the younger completed before his death, in 1915, the first volume, extending to 1848. Mr. E. D. Adams, as his collaborator, and with an earlier manuscript of C. F. Adams, Jr., at hand for use, prepared the second, 1848-1860. For the third volume, the only one which need here be considered, little or no text had been written, though large preparations had been made. It should be said:

1. That Mr. C. F. Adams allowed Mr. E. D. Adams to have a set of transcripts of the materials which Mr. Ford describes;

2. That while the uses to which Mr. E. D. Adams might put these transcripts were not definitely prescribed in writing, the natural assumption is that Mr. C. F. Adams expected them to be used later in a book on Great Britain and the Civil War which the former had already begun, it being at that time the confident expectation of both writers that the "life" would be finished first and published soon;

3. That when Mr. E. D. Adams set out to finish for publication the book now under consideration he understood, and had reasons for understanding, that publication of the whole biography of C. F. Adams the elder was indefinitely, though it was hoped not permanently, postponed.

4. He also understood the latest thought concerning the third volume to be that it should be composed, not by causing the preparation of a fresh narrative based on all the materials collected but by a compilation of extracts from the manuscript war-time diary of C. F. Adams the elder and printed papers of his son;

5. This situation seemed to Professor Adams to leave him free in all conscience to use his set of the transcripts in the writing of a book on "Great Britain and the Civil War";

6. Permission for their use for this purpose was sought and obtained from their British owners, public and private, with careful explanation of the different purpose now had in mind. To this procedure Mr. Ford, on being informed of it beforehand, raised no objection.

Washington, January 2

J. F. JAMIESON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is awkward to reply to one not a party to the question, who admits that he is "cognizant of some of the facts," who has heard only one side, and who "naturally assumes" that Mr. C. F. Adams expected the material to be used by Professor Adams at some indefinite time for his own [the professor's] purpose. I objected strongly from the time the professor said he proposed to use the material, both as a question of decency and of right; but when he stated he expected Mr. Hoover's influence to be potent in securing access to the public papers, I gave way as to the papers in the Public Record Office—less than half the material—as I could not but recognize that such influence there would be effective.

But I have held from the first, and made it plain, that the private collections rested on a different basis and that access to them did not depend on the officials of government but on the unique claims of Mr. C. F. Adams. It is one thing to gain such access for the life of a father by a son, and a very different thing to say to the owner of the papers: "I have a copy of this letter, may I use it?" which was the method of Professor Adams. Mr. Jamieson confuses the two series—as professor Adams did—and even in asserting that I raised no objection. The great question of ethical conduct remaining, for in my view the professor's zeal for his own interests has carried him into violating a trust and appropriating to his own use what belonged to another.

WORTHINGTON C. FORD

Admiral Bristol

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am pleased to see (in your number of December 2) that you could not let Rear Admiral Mark L. Bristol return to Constantinople without expressing appreciation of his work. As one who has had unusual opportunity to observe that work at first hand, I fully agree with your remarks. Even to the fact that you use the word "extraordinary" three times in nine lines. The Admiral is a triply extraordinary admiral, diplomat, and statesman.

A Turkish diplomat said to me the other day: "We are anxious to resume normal treaty relations with the United States, except for one consequence we fear they will have: Admiral Bristol will then be replaced."

Everybody in the Near East, including Americans, of course, wants the Admiral to remain. Why should we let anything deprive us of the services which his character and experience during the past six years allow him to give in the future?

C. K. STURGE

Our Press

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I desire to call your attention to what is an increasingly alarming situation as regards the moral influence of the daily press of the United States. The front page of the San Francisco Chronicle for December 22, 1925, offers a striking illustration.

An analysis of this front page is quite suggestive. Ninety-three per cent, or 150 column inches, are used in the following manner:

15 inches—Political scandal in Los Angeles.

17 inches—Photo of dead divorcee and two stories of accidental deaths.

20 inches—Tragic death of rich divorcee, who seems to have driven off the docks into the bay in a storm at about three in the morning, after attending a party.

14 inches—Platoon of suicide and girl supposed to have jilted him, prompting the act. Also article on fraud in dry work.

18 inches—Story of above suicide.

20 inches—Rate suit between P. G. & E. (our leading benevolent public service corporation) and the city of San Francisco. Company offers to refund $1,000,000 to city in compromise settlement.

20 inches—News oddities, headed by a run-runner story.

On a Death Mask

(H. W. M. died November 14, 1925)

By EDGAR LEE MASTERS

I

Life cuts depressions and these make reliefs,
As gnarls make hollows in the final cast
By Life the sculptor. So this mask amassed
In bronze what Life had done: brought clear beliefs
From the incisions of defeating griefs;
From hate brought love, brought wisdom, and at last
Brought peace and pardon, as the soul surpassed
The clay and rose emancipate from the fiefs
Of Fate and flesh—all sculpturing here is shown
Of Life whose hands opposed or helped his soul,
Resisting or accepting in the role
Of clay and spirit making the Fate his own
For the master mask, whose finish would control
The dignity of bronze, the peace of stone!

II

Whatever Life pressed down and back is here:
Great music only imagined, never heard;
Great fellowships afar, always deferred;
And life more ample in a richer sphere.
The spirit of genius to his eye was clear
In lovers, lovers, in the impassioned word.
Beethoven's face, or Shelley's, Byron's stirred Fraternal reverence, as the returning year
Denied his longing, and as a deepening glance
Revealed him to himself, his stuff and strain,
Called by Venetian songs, an English lane,
By happy freedoms where men drink and dance.
So Traviata speaks him, so remain
In bronze the prize denied, the great romance.

III

Scarcely in life did the life that moved within
This brow, these eyelids, these Mercutio cheeks
Break the disguise of flesh—but now all speaks
Down to the humorous mouth and granite chin,
And the laughing rays that star the untroubled skin
About the eye which smiles, and no more seeks
The Secret. But the eye long blind still wrecks
Its patient wonder, leaving the brow to win,
And solve the secrets blindness sees—this brow
Like a great boulder from the Sangamon. . .
I never saw him all in all, this son
Of Jackson's day, but Death instructs me how:
This Hawthorne face, this prairie Jefferson,
This type American departed now!

IV

As if the Fate which brought paralysis,
And closed his throat to water for his thirst,
Intended his last hours to match his first,
With strength prolonged to ask the benefice
Of water and the tenderness of a kiss—
So did it punish him it had amerced,
And gave not water, neither the lot reversed

Which all his days wrought hard antithesis
Between his longing and his long defeat.
An old man dying in a lonely room
Where no one but a nurse was had his doom
Of thirst and silence and a winding sheet.
Now the bronze smiles upon the distant tomb:
Love is and thirst, but Death how great and sweet!

The Enigmatic Burr

Aaron Burr: A Biography compiled from Rare, and in many Cases Unpublished, Sources. By Samuel H. Wandell and Meade Minnigerode. G. P. Putnam's Sons. Two volumes. $10.

THE botanist passes no moral judgment on the wanton lipstick of the rose or the cruel kiss of the poison ivy; nor is his scientific attitude toward them influenced by their relation to the past of his race or to his own political, economic, and social views. Our scientific training has prepared us for this dispassionate view of the surrounding flora on the part of our botanizing friends, but we have not yet learned to expect the same objectivity of our historians. Upon them we impose the task of providing us with ready-made judgments on historic figures in order that we may know whom to admire, whom to condemn. So the historians, anticipating the Day of Judgment, set themselves up as spokesmen of God and mete out praise and blame as their own prejudices dictate.

Such thoughts have been inspired by reading this new biography of the most enigmatic of Americans, Aaron Burr, whose career is described in popular history much as an historically minded botanist might describe the evolution of poison ivy. He was the sum of all immoralities, a profligate, a dishonest politician, a duelist without honor, a traitor to his country. Many public men have been accused by contemporaries of similar crimes and misdemeanors which good-natured history has chucked into the garbage can of putrescent politics. No kind hand, however, has drawn, until recent times, the curtain over the skeleton in Burr's closet. There is good reason for this, although it is not to be found in the magnitude of his sins. He offended Washington, he killed Hamilton in a duel, he made of Jefferson an enemy. Thus his reputation has not swum in either stream of the hallowed tradition which bubbled up from the footprints of the canonized fathers. Historians of both the Hamiltonian and the Jefferson schools have been free to take a kick at the memory of Aaron Burr.

The Aaron Burr of the popular picture album is a purely fictitious character, a creature of the contemporary propaganda so readily accepted by uncritical and simple-minded historians. About twenty-five years ago a courageous student, Walter F. McCaleb, made a careful study of the so-called historical sources and succeeded in breaking through the wall of prejudices and presenting us a picture nearer the truth. Now come a man of research and a man of letters with this new life. It is based on the older work but presents a full-figure portrait with bolder strokes. The process of rehabilitating the true Burr may be considered as accomplished, as Mr. McCaleb himself points out in a well-written introduction to the work.

The biography is not directed to the specialist; there are no footnotes; the bibliography lacks all scholarly apparatus; some items of importance are missing, such as the work of W. S. Robertson on Miranda and that of Professor Marshall on the boundaries of Louisiana. On the other hand the reproductions of portraits, some for the first time, are excellent and form a most interesting addition to the work. Fortunately the authors have not indulged in psychoanalysis—at most there is only a hint of it—nor have they sinned too much on the side of special pleading. They let the simple facts speak for themselves. But it is evident from their interpretation of Jefferson's acts and their few slurs about Woodrow Wilson—why need they tell us their own politics?—that the authors belong to the more respectable historical tradition that flows from Hamilton through Lincoln to Roosevelt. I do not mean that they slur over the faults of Hamilton, for his political and private life touched Burr's at too many points to permit this, but the great Federalist does appear in more dignified character than does the protagonist of Democracy.

The first volume carries the life story of Burr through the episode, or rather the tragedy, of the duel with Hamilton. The picture of Burr is rather engaging than otherwise. His ancestry ran to notable piety, his father was president of Princeton, his maternal grandfather was Jonathan Edwards. He was a precocious child but not a genius, his mind being too formal and rigid. He treated his wife and his brilliant daughter, Theodosia, as a schoolmaster does his pupils; yet his life at home was in many ways beautiful, for deep love and profound respect dwelt there, in spite of the waywardness of the head's affection. Many women crossed his pathway. His legal and political life had much of brilliance, and he won for himself the esteem of his contemporaries by his common sense, his ability, and the liberalism of his principles.

The duel with Hamilton marks the turning-point in his life. The propagandists of the Federalists and Republicans alike hounded him until the people were prepared to believe him capable of any crime. His Western adventure in land speculation with its Mexican filibustering attachment furnished the material to feed popular credulity. Betrayed by his associate, General Wilkinson, who raised the hue and cry and fortified New Orleans, and accused of treason by Jefferson, who put in motion all the forces of the federal government to convict him, Burr was easily condemned in the court of public opinion though cleared by the court over which the Chief Justice of the United States presided. He fled to Europe, where he continued to talk grandiosely of expeditions into Mexico even while he was clinking his two last ha'pennies in his pocket to keep up his financial courage. On his return to New York he was unable to regain his position in society or politics. His enemies had done their work well. Burr as interpreted by the authors presents an interesting study in developing personality and persisting propaganda.

CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD

Beauty into Wit

The Private Life of Helen of Troy. By John Erskine. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

VIEWS rigorously as a novel, Mr. Erskine's first venture in prose narrative may contain some faults; but it is a highly aesthetic reader who, that he might peep and criticize, would forcibly renounce the mood of chuckling joy in which its wit, its lightness, its ironic observation, its emancipating frankness leave him. One of the most humorous and brilliantly incisive conversationalists of our day has for the time being abandoned the fields of criticism and lyric poetry to take up a position in which he is more obviously impregnable. "Helen of Troy," whatever else it may be, is the best talk this reviewer has met in years, whether inside or outside the covers of a book. Never to encroach on the province of the drama and yet to write a continuously interesting novel in three hundred pages, only ten of which are narrative or expository in form, is in itself an astounding technical feat. The brisk tempo, the unflagging reality, the neatness of execution which advances the plot evenly by a mere notation of the talk of half a dozen characters—Menelaus, Hermione, Orestes, the priceless gate-keeper Eteoneus, the only less successful Charitas, and finally the peerless Helen herself—these and other originalities entitle the book to serious consideration as a new art form. There will be a host of imitators to prove this contention. But Mr. Erskine has little to fear. They will not talk as he does.

In no real sense is the book a life of Helen of Troy. It is essentially unrelated to that increasingly wearisome modern phenomenon, the Strachey-Maurois novel-biography. The author's kinship is rather with Euripides. Both handle old beloved myths with as much reverence as originality, using the legitimate glamor that clings to the heroic figures, but adding satire, psychology in the untechnical sense, and the idea-world of the contemporary critical consciousness. The author depends upon the simple base of classical legend, carefully collated and pieced together with a completely unobtrusive scholarship, to give us the past of his characters so that he may the more entirely illuminate their temperaments without any stressing of accident and circumstance. Essentially, of course, the book is a novel of modern life, and a highly inclusive one, because all the blur of explanation, character-introduction, and locale was wiped clean centuries ago by Homer, Euripides, and others. If penetrating depiction of character, and of character alone, is the essence of a narrative masterpiece, "Helen of Troy" is one of the most formally pure novels of recent years.

Its most obvious achievement is Helen herself. "It will be seen that apart from her divine beauty and entire frankness she was a conventional woman," says the disarming foreword. This modest declaration does not at all prepare one for a Helen who, to put it simply, is at once convincingly realistic and glamorously epic. Utterly clear, distinct, and modern, a life-size Shavian heroine who has forgotten to propagandize—yet she is also the miraculous possessor of the face (and spirit) that launched a thousand ships and burnt the topless towers. The unknown quantity which Marlowe felt is in her—and not less that modern subtlety, that cool clarity of insight into the tangle of alien souls, which holds so special an appeal for the predominantly psychological temper of our time.

The Story of Workers' Education

Workers' Education in England and the United States. By Margaret T. Hodgen. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

IT is fortunate for the cause of workers' education that so scholarly, so admirably written, and so sympathetic a book should appear at this critical hour in the development of labor's own educational enterprises. These ventures have their roots deep in the soil of the labor movement; to understand the forms they are assuming, to detect their weaknesses and their potentialities, necessitates a tracing of those roots, an analysis of that life-giving soil. And this is exactly what Miss Hodgen does, with the painstaking thoroughness of the scholar and the color and warmth of the enthusiast.

Miss Hodgen begins her story of workers' education in the United States with a closely packed statement of the social and economic conditions which gave rise to the Working Men's Party in 1828, a labor organization which "became the chief instrument of the founding of the American public-school system." But this accomplishment does not mark the beginning of genuine workers' education, for by means of the public schools the workers of the thirties "proposed to educate themselves not for working-class activity but for admission to middle-class opportunity." This tradition of the Working Men's Party persisted until but a few years ago as the accepted trade-union doctrine. An explanation is found by the author in the philosophy which during those years dominated American trade unionism—the economic philosophy of Samuel Gompers. In this discussion the author unfortunately allows herself to criticize orthodox unionism's stand on education not analytically but with the scorn of a partisan.

The beginnings of genuine workers' education—the education of workingmen to meet the peculiar problems of working-class life—Miss Hodgen finds in the Women's Trade Union League and the Jewish needle-trade unions. Today labor's own schools and colleges are found in almost every field, and number over two hundred; twenty-five thousand workers attend them; classes are to be found in every important city. Miss Hodgen points out, however, that in spite of this remarkable spread of the movement workers' education in America is still in the experimental stage, that even to the best-informed its methods and its ultimate purposes are as yet in dispute and ill-defined. Shall the schools teach union administration, "something practical that will help . . . in the time of a strike"; shall they try to instruct workers in the industrial and social responsibilities which a shift in control may bring; shall they try to "pass culture around" to the men and women who do the hard work of the world? On such questions of fundamental purposes there is the utmost confusion; Miss Hodgen's book is an invaluable aid in the solution of the difficulty.

In the same volume the author has written the story of workers' education in England. Her history of the English workingman's intellectual struggles is comparable in excellence to the Webbs's achievement in recording his economic struggles. The book will doubtless be read more widely in England than here, since workers' education is there more firmly and generally established.

Among the Czechs

A Wayfarer in Czecho-Slovakia. By E. I. Robson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

MR. ROBSON begins with a word about the Czech people, their customs and their country. He goes on to an historical sketch of Prague, which he is tempted to misname a "great international capital." Even though Prague has ever been the focal point of Czech culture and art, it is by no means outwardly a world center like Berlin, Vienna, or even Budapest. History in Central Europe is as vividly remembered as if it all happened yesterday, and Mr. Robson is on the right track when he attempts to interpret the spirit of the Czech people by telling us about their idols—Jan Hus the reformer and the extraordinary Hussite Jan Zizka. Just why the author fails to mention Komensky (Comenius) is not clear.

Mr. Robson saw all of the curiosities in western Czecho-Slovakia. He was, as we all are, enchanted by Zlatá Praha (Golden Prague), the noble and picturesque capital-city; he visited lofty Karlstein, the most striking of the many fine monuments that Charles IV left to posterity; he wandered through the vast Bohemian forest of Sumava; he delved into the fiery spirit of the Hussites at Tabor, their once impregnable stronghold in southern Bohemia; the Moravian capital of Brno (Brünn) he found only less interesting than Prague itself; and he considers the caves of Mococho near Brno to be one of the supreme natural wonders in Europe. All true, but what a pity our wayfarer did not move on into Slovakia, where Oriental Europe still holds sway. If he liked the colorful peasant costumes of Moravia he would have beheld the entire peasantry of Slovakia, both Slovak and Magyar, clothed in clumsy, gaudy beauty. If he succeeded in qualifying in his own mind the medieval Catholic odium that "Bohemians are dull and drab," he would have discovered in Slovakia a race fiery and talented and untouched by civilization. And if he is interested, as doubtless he is, in moral reconstruction he would have found in Slovakia, in Mr. Seton-Watson's words, the most remarkable example of cultural progress in modern times.

Nevertheless, Mr. Robson is a delightful wayfarer. Fortunately he does not touch on politics in Czecho-Slovakia, for politics anywhere, even there, can go a long way toward ruining an otherwise charming narrative. Moreover, he has overcome the silly prejudice about "that impossible Czech language." Throughout he makes use of Czech names with deadly accuracy.

JOHN O. CRANE

Karl Kautsky

The Labor Revolution. By Karl Kautsky. The Dial Press. $2.50.

CRITICIZED as a sciolist by the Conservative, denounced as a renegade by the Communist, hailed as a philosophic genius by the Social-Democrat, Kautsky is one of the most provocative and powerful figures in our generation. In reality he belongs to a past generation, although his influence, mitigated somewhat by his opposition to the bolshevik revolution, is still wide-sweeping and profound. At the age of seventy-one he still writes with a directness and a lucidity which are foreeful if they are not elegant.

Following the appearance in English of "The Foundations of Christianity," an old but still ingenious and competent work, this fresh volume of Kautsky introduces a new side of the author to a public which hitherto had known him only through the abominable Askew and Bohn translations. Before the bolshevik tour de force of 1917 socialist thought had been largely consumed with dialectics and party tactics, with disquisitions on the character of the industrial state and the fundamental approach of radical organizations. Today the center of interest has veered. With the survival and advance of the Soviet system in Russia and with the tentative flare of socialist governments in Western Europe, more immediate problems are presented. It is the problem of the transition from capitalism to socialism upon which the attention of radicals is now so anxiously focused, and "The Labor Revolution" concerns itself with this.

While Kautsky's historical analysis of the middle-class revolution, adduced to defend his position with reference to contemporary revolution, is limpid and revealing, his attack upon the bolshevik revolution as but an instance in the process of middle-class revolution savors strongly of personal prejudice and rationalization. That the transition period in Russia may at times have been scarred by hastiness and misjudgment does not justify its being classified as reactionary and ridiculous. The laws of revolution, even the labor revolution, have not been finally established. Moot problems still remain. The labor revolutions in other Western countries may take on a different aspect, but this is not a sufficient reason for saying that Russian communism illustrates "the transition from the revolution to the reaction." Russian conditions were peculiar; and it must not be forgotten, since Kautsky refers so frequently to the founder of scientific socialism, that it was Marx who said that even a precocious society "can shorten and lessen the birth-pangs" necessary to the development of a new order. The subtlety of Kautsky's arguments—and Kautsky is an agile logician—cannot annihilate the significance of that statement.

Leon Daudet

Memoirs of Leon Daudet. Edited and Translated by Arthur Kingsland Griggs. The Dial Press. $5.

DAUDET is a phenomenon unknown, inexplicable, in America—a man at once a rowdy politician and a literary figure. As to the rowdiness of his political methods, no one need enlarge upon that. Daudet and his camelots du roi have been sufficiently in the press. As to his sincerity, there is a question. Perhaps he is as sincere as any politician. In Paris one is told that Daudet, having failed to make headway in the parties of the Left, took up royalism as a shrewd business move. Yet in spite of Daudet's howling no one in France takes the royalist party seriously. There is indeed this new fascist movement, the blue shirts, with some of the royalist figures in it, and shibboleths roughly paralleling those of the royalists—that is a different matter, it may grow to power.

But it is Daudet the literary man who writes this book. He was born into the most interesting literary circle of the French nineteenth century, and he absorbed the art of writing through the skin. He has known everybody—from Renan, looking like “an elephant who has lost his trunk,” to Proust, “pale, with eyes like a deer, always nibbling or pulling one end of his drooping brown mustache, and wrapped up in woolens like a Chinese idol”; Theodore de Banville, “whose talk was as airy as an improvisation of Mercutio”; Whistler, looking like “an attractive Mephisto”; fat Zola, “reigning on his dung heap . . . lisping and wriggling his forked nose”; Oscar Wilde, Clemenceau, Sardou, Octave Mirbeau, George Meredith, Barrès, Anatole France, Loti, Jaurès, Maupassant—what a company! And how much more sharply Daudet etches his enemies than he does his friends!

WEBB WALDRON

Books in Brief

Henry Ford, America's Don Quixote. By Louis P. Lochner. With a preface by Maxim Gorki. New York: International Publishers. $3.

Louis Lochner, who was Henry Ford's secretary at the time the peace ship was sent to Europe, has set forth in this volume the facts of that adventure which reflected so favorably upon the heart of Mr. Ford and so unfavorably upon his brains. It was Mr. Lochner who suggested the peace ship. Mr. Ford was immediately taken with the idea and offered the vessel to President Wilson for the use of official delegates with a view to intercession in Europe through the neutral nations. Mr. Wilson declined; the next day Mr. Ford announced the peace ship to reporters in New York with the famous slogan: “We are going to get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas.” He entered upon this venture without the slightest consideration of what was involved. He had thought of no details, no method of procedure, who was to go or when the ship was to leave; with the result that as remarkable a collection of cranks as surely ever voyaged the Seven Seas departed without any more knowledge of what they were to do than Mr. Ford had himself. This book shows how much the International Commission, subsequently established by Mr. Ford as a result of this expedition (which he deserted shamefully as soon as things got uncomfortable), actually accomplished. It makes it presumable that if the right forces had been behind this undertaking much might have been accomplished at that time in arousing public opinion in the neutral and other nations against the continuance of the useless and fruitless mass-murders which accomplished nothing beyond setting the world back. Mr. Gorki's preface is an eloquent appeal to the women of America and the world to put an end to war. As a whole the book was worth doing as a record of a war episode tragic in its futility.

Sixteenth-Century Books. A Bibliography of Literature describing books printed between 1501 and 1601. By James Bennett Childs. Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America. Vol. XVII, Part 2.

The bibliography of sixteenth-century literature has suffered under the spell of that of the fifteenth. The chief interest of the bibliographers of the first half-century after the invention of printing has been typographical. They have produced monographs on the productions of the printing presses of individual towns and on the work of individual printers. There are not a dozen works devoted to the productions of the printing presses of whole nations, though there are comprehensive records of all the known incunabula. The bulk of the material brought together by Mr. Childs consists of monographic studies of individual printers and works on the history of printing in cities and provinces. Mr. Childs has done a distinct service to students of the sixteenth century by collecting these four hundred and sixty-four titles; it is to be hoped that among other things his work will call attention to the need of a comprehensive bibliography of the literature of the sixteenth century.

Art

“Significant Form”

WHILE Mark Twain was editor of a certain Western paper he printed a news item describing with great seriousness and much scientific detail the discovery of a petrified man. He mentioned that the thumb of the man's right hand was against the nose, the fingers spread out, the thumb of the left hand hooked into the little finger of the right, and the fingers spread out likewise. Only, instead of saying it all at once like this, he sandwiched the bits of the description in among other details; and nobody saw the joke. The story was widely reprinted as scientific news and actually appeared in the London Lancet.

A similar and wonderfully baited trap seems to have been laid by the talented art critic, Mr. Clive Bell, for the innocent readers of his book on “Art.” Mr. Bell there asks: “What quality is shared by all objects that provoke our aesthetic emotions?” He answers that in each such object “lines and colors combined in a particular way, certain forms and relations of forms” are what stir our aesthetic emotions; and he proposes to refer to these forms by the name Significant Form. But if we now inquire just what particular way of combination of lines and colors it is that the name designates, the only answer is, the particular way which moves us aesthetically! Significant Form, alas, thus turns out to be only the name of what Mr. Bell is looking for. He has named the baby before it is born. Perhaps a babyless name is a less awkward gift than a nameless baby.

The bait held out to us is cunningly tempting, for the word “form” really means something; namely, whatever is other than content—in visual art, one would suppose, whatever is other than color. But let us beware of the trap, for our author slyly tells us that “the distinction between form and color is an unreal one,” because, forsooth, “you cannot conceive a colorless line, or a colorless space . . . a boundary line without any content, or a content without a boundary line.” This is as much as to say that because one cannot conceive of an uncle without a niece or nephew, the distinction between uncle and nephew is an unreal one. On this ground Mr. Bell proposes to use form to mean both form and content—which is like saying that a Negro is a black man, and adding that black means white also. But the little joke on the reader, of course, demanded that the meaning of the word “form” be quietly done away with.

And with regard to the word “significant,” our author is equally clever, for he tells us in effect that so long as we confine ourselves to aesthetics and leave out “metaphysics” the word “significant” is not, as we might have thought, descriptive. This means, of course, that it is a proper name only, a mere tag which can be pinned on to things but which tells us about them only the fact that we did pin it on. To avoid being misled by the appearance of meaning in the term, let us then replace “Significant Form” by an honest proper name. Shall we say “Abracadabra”? We can then better observe what the “aesthetic hypothesis,” as Mr. Bell deliciously calls it, turns out to be when the veils wherewith his wit had clouded its glory are torn asunder. It is this: The quality common to such lines, colors, and combinations of lines and colors as move us aesthetically is that we shall henceforth call them all Abracadabra!

I submit that Mr. Bell is much too clever a critic to have done a thing like that unawares. Moreover, other evidences of the plot are not far to seek. Note, for instance, how neatly he clears beauty out of the way of Abracadabra. Mr. Bell's objection to the use of the word beauty is that everyone calls a butterfly or a flower beautiful, but that no one feels for them, or in general for natural beauty, the same kind of emotion that he feels for a cathedral or a picture. Therefore what calls forth the aesthetic emotion should not be designated beautiful.

But in addition to the beauty of the butterflies, the flowers, and the birds, Mr. Bell also mentions the beauty of woman as something that is not aesthetically moving. What is commonly meant, he believes, when a woman is called beautiful is sexually desirable. Mr. Bell does not say whether this definition of beauty is intended also to cover the case of the birds and the butterflies; but so far as people are concerned, who like most of us venture to call not only women but also some men beautiful, it is obvious that on such a definition of beauty they belong in Reading Gaol. However, salvation from the slough of impurity in which we thus find ourselves wallowing unawares would seem to lie in the possibility of making artists of ourselves, for Mr. Bell admits that artists at least are moved aesthetically by nature; that is, what in it arrests their gaze is not the foulness which beauty is but the pure sublimity of Abracadabra.

This discovery, however, brings us out of aesthetics, and into the realm of "metaphysics," where the word significant is given a meaning by our author. Form that moves us aesthetically is called significant, he tells us, "because it expresses the emotion of its creator." With Tolstoi—or is it Croce?—thus brought to the rescue, our hopes of solid nourishment suddenly rise. But, alas, we have here but the fragrant bit of intellectual cheese which is to entice the guileless bohemian mouse further into the cruel trap. For if the art which moves us does so because it conveys to us something that the artist felt, how is it that the same emotion can be provoked, at least in artists, by nature, which does not express but just is? But now Schopenhauer, in strict incognito it is true, is called in to help with the "dirty work." Natural objects, we are told, give rise to aesthetic emotion only when one ceases to attend to their associations, uses, origins. And when a natural object is being thus viewed as what Mr. Bell pleases to call an end-in-itself, what there is then left to provoke our emotion is, he tells us, something which philosophers used to call "the thing-in-itself" and now call "ultimate reality." A devilishly subtle transition, that: End-in-Itself, Thing-in-Itself, Ultimate Reality! One almost regrets that it should be but verbal. However, what comes next is the grand pied-de-nez. It is this: "Shall I be altogether fantastic in suggesting, what some of the profoundest thinkers have believed, that the significance of the thing-in-itself is the significance of reality?"

One might well ask how it is possible to speak of a thing as in-itself and yet make it function as significant of something? But Schopenhauer, instead of arguing the logic of that outrageous statement, would more likely have roared at seeing the words "significant forms" picked bodily out of his book, where he uses them honestly, and wantonly made a joke of under the shroud of a faked-up spook which, on some intellectually dark night, might be mistaken by unwary pedestrians for his own.

If we look at the whole matter by daylight, the fact is seen to be that the elementary lines, colors, sounds which art borrows from nature, together with such feeling-value as they there have, constitute the only alphabet wherewith the artist may spell out to others his own feelings. Just how the characters of that alphabet must be put together to do this well no one has yet said very exactly, Mr. Bell less than any one. And there is nothing to be gained by giving a resounding name to the problem and calling that the answer. This would be like sucking one's own thumb for nourishment. "Significant Form" is thus but a clever catchword for putting a real aesthetic problem quietly out of the way. And indeed, recalling the advice of Goethe's Mephistopheles to the student, one may well ask: Why think when a pompous word will serve so well?

C. J. DUCASSE

Drama

Whips and Scorns

AFTER two disastrous experiments with native but highly derivative essays in expressionism the directors of the Provincetown Theater have returned to an original source and are offering for the first time in America "The Dream Play" of Strindberg. Their production, highly intelligent, and, if judged by the rather lenient standards applicable to a purely experimental theater, well acted, will serve among other things to illustrate the difference between art and sham as exemplified in what, for want of a better name, we call expressionism. Strindberg, unlike Mr. Basshe who was responsible for "Adam Solitaire" and unlike Mr. Webster who concocted "The Man Who Never Died," was not compelled to labor his incoherence; whatever else may be said of his fantastic piece, it must be admitted that its chaos is at least unforced and real. Born of a tardily legitimized union between a bankrupt shopkeeper and a bar maid, remembering fear and hunger as his earliest sensations, and torn throughout life by the conflict between the impulses of a perverse nature and the judgments of a moralizing mind, gloom was not to him a fashionable affectation nor formlessness a new form to be assiduously cultivated. Heredity had given him a hopelessly neurotic temperament, a lifetime of tortured maladjustment had convinced him that suffering was the lot of all mankind, and when, toward the end, he made "The Dream Play" a chaotic compendium of human ills he was writing from his deepest conviction. Perhaps his vision was awry and his reactions morbid; perhaps the confused but vivid scenes which he sketched were the product of a mind on the point of dissolution; but to him his vision was real and it bears the stamp of sincerity.

He had already, in a series of realistic plays, attempted to illustrate some of the major discords of life, but his perceptions had continually outrun his pen. Human misery seemed too vast ever to be thus described, and its forms too manifold ever to be set down one by one. The universe, as he contemplated it in himself, lost its pattern and its logic; it became for him a nightmare of suffering and injustice, and only as a nightmare could it be reproduced. Into one play, if it were to be other than ridiculously inadequate, must be crowded not one discord or one tragedy but that endless succession of tragedies which is the story of humanity and that cumulation of innumerable discords which is existence. The whole catalogue of miseries, from the pangs of despised love and the other ills which Hamlet enumerated on through the results of economic injustice and all the other sources of evil discovered by the sad experience of mankind since his time, must be recited; and life must be presented as the phantasmagoria of suffering which an epitome shows it to be.

Thus expressionism was born, not out of conscious experiment but out of a need for expression. Strindberg did not decide to represent life in a free form with the logical illogic of a dream; rather life suddenly came to be, for him, more like a nightmare than like anything else, and as such he set it down. The scene, like the scene of a dream, shifts without logical reason from vaguely localized place to place, and the characters bob up, often strangely transmogrified, in fantastic but curiously significant situations; but, again as in a dream, the material from which the fantasies are composed is the most poignant experience of the dreamer. Here, for example, is Strindberg himself suffering under the tyranny of an absurd schoolmaster and, though conscious that he has received his doctor's degree, strangely unable to get away; there is the ugly girl at a dance hiding her shame in a corner; and there in the midst of an idyllic scene are suddenly observed two grimy workmen who make possible the indulgences which they are forbidden to share. All changes and all passes, but in the nightmare which life has become for him no scene rises to his mind which has not at its core some misery or some injustice simplified and made typical. Strindberg is not exactly writing a dream play; he is rather engaged in the process of dreaming, for as a result of the gradual process by which his inward world became more vivid and real than the outward one his work began to follow the pattern of his fantasy instead of the pattern of objective existence. He had ceased to live and to record; he merely tossed in the nightmare which his life had generated. This is no place to discuss the causes of this process or to undertake any final evaluation of the work in question, but it ought at least to be plain why it is that "The Dream Play" has all the vivid fascination of a real dream, while some of the imitations which have been laboriously made of it have, on the contrary, all the irritating tediousness of the breakfast table liar who makes up tales out of Freud.

Booth Tarkington's "Seventeen" is in itself just sufficiently exaggerated and overdone to furnish admirable material for the libretto of "Hello Lola" (Eltinge Theater), a musical comedy which I found considerably more amusing than the average, chiefly on account of some first-rate burlesquing. "Sweetheart Time" (Imperial Theater) is another musical comedy, but one of more conventional pattern, and it is at least pleasing to the eye. "The House of Usher" (Fifth Avenue Playhouse) is an uninspired but competent drama, which tells how the daughter of a wily Jewish financier undertook to outwit him in the cause of love; while as for "Move On" (Daly's Theater), the less said of it the better.

An International Fascist Plot

By EMERY DÉRI

ABOUT two months ago Benito Mussolini announced the foundation of a new Roman empire as the next step on the conquering road of Fascism. This speech, containing the threatening remark that "two million Italians are ready to march," produced marked nervousness in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, which suspected some mysterious political scheme lurking behind Mussolini's rhetorical phrases. Not more than two months passed before sensational events in Rumania, Hungary, and Bavaria began to indicate the outlines of Signor Mussolini's gigantic scheme of a second Roman empire. The arrest of well-known Fascist leaders in Rumania, the measures taken by the Government, and the statements of such Nationalist leaders as Julius Maniu show that the sudden resignation of Crown Prince Carol was connected with a well-prepared Fascist plot, which the Bratianu Government was able to obstruct. At the same time the investigation of the counterfeiting conspiracy in Hungary brought to light the plans for an immediate Fascist revolution in that country. The German newspapers' exposure of the complicity of Bavarian Fascist leaders in the counterfeiting affair in Hungary throws light on the close connection between the Fascist revolutions planned in Hungary, Rumania, and Bavaria. The details of a sensational scheme are coming to light—a scheme of starting Fascist revolutions simultaneously in those three states, seizing the power by a coup de main, lifting Carol to the throne of Rumania, making Archduke Albrecht King of Hungary and Prince Rupprecht King of Bavaria, and creating a chain of new Fascist kingdoms from the Danube to the Black Sea, backed by the active support of Fascist Italy.

The history of the movement dates back to the early summer, when the Hungarian Archduke Albrecht visited the ex-Kaiser at Doorn. This young, blond, and rather insignificant Hapsburg harbored secret claims to the Hungarian throne, which, however, were not taken seriously in Hungary either by the Legitimists or by the so-called Free Electioners. Albrecht had no party in Hungary and no support abroad. His only strength was his mother, the Archduchess Isabella, an extremely clever old lady, who understood how to make friends and how to organize secret movements in the interest of her son. The visit to Doorn was made under the pretext that Albrecht, having been the guest of a Prince Salm in the Rhineland, wished to pay his respects to William II. A few days later several well-informed Bavarian newspapers reported a meeting between Archduke Albrecht and Prince Rupprecht of Bavaria, who was in Mondsee at the time. Archduke Albrecht, on his way to Rome with his mother, stopped in Mondsee, where they were guests of Prince Rupprecht. In August they were in Rome. The pretext of this sojourn was to appear before the Pope. Italian newspapers, however, did not mention the young Hapsburg's audiences with the Holy Father, but, on the other hand, his frequent visits to the Quirinal stirred much comment. Mussolini's press mentioned with satisfaction that the young Archduke came to Rome to study Fascism. Rumors began to circulate in the Hungarian and Austrian press that Albrecht would marry a daughter of the King of Italy, the younger sister of Princess Mafalda.

Archduke Albrecht remained for several weeks in Rome, spending much time with Signor Mussolini. No one in Hungary suspected at this time that Albrecht would soon appear in Budapest as pretender to the throne of St. Stephen. A second visit of Albrecht to Mondsee and a second meeting with Rupprecht, however, drew public attention to his movements. A Vienna newspaper reported that an agreement between Albrecht and Rupprecht had been reached: both were to seize power and become kings, but Albrecht was not to aspire to the Austrian throne; it was agreed that a part of Austria should go to Bavaria. The report was ridiculed everywhere in Central Europe. But the earnest Berliner Tageblatt saw danger in the conspiratory spirit prevalent in Bavaria and remarked upon the apparent activity in reactionary circles. As to young Albrecht, he continued his journeying. He spent a few days unofficially in Bucharest. Fascist leaders, such as Professor Cuza, paid visits to him and, as was only natural, he also saw Crown Prince Carol. Strangely enough, the press of Central Europe paid no attention to this incognito visit. Not until months afterward, when the resignation of Prince Carol startled the world, did the Paris press suddenly remember that early in the fall Archduke Albrecht had seen Prince Carol in Bucharest, and link this mysterious visit with the resignation of the Rumanian Crown Prince.

These journeys of Archduke Albrecht, these secret or even open meetings were the first steps toward a Fascist organization throughout Central and Eastern Europe. Fascism was organized already under different names in all three countries. In Rumania they called themselves Nationalists; in Hungary, Awakening Magyars; in Bavaria, Hakenkreuzler. The only thing that remained to do was to merge the various groups into one powerful organization. The merger was effected on a cold business basis in a perfectly businesslike manner.

From October on things took a sudden and startling turn everywhere. Archduke Albrecht appeared in Budapest and started an open propaganda in the interest of his aspirations for the throne, avowing openly his Fascist sympathies. Suddenly this young Hapsburg, who had had no party and no backing, marshaled behind him all the reactionary organizations. Two newspapers supported him, he was elected president of the powerful League of Social Organizations, and Bishop Rassay greeted him after his election with the words: "Art thou he who was about to come? . . ." While before there were Awakening Magyars and Knights of the Double Cross in Hungary, all organizations now assumed the name "Fascists." The newspapers were full of stories about Albrecht. The Fascists openly claimed the support of Mussolini. Political murderers fled to Italy and there enjoyed the protection of the Fascios. One of them, a man named Kmetty, perpetrator of a bomb attempt, was bold enough to send a telegram to a Fascist paper in Budapest, saying that he was in safety and under the protection of the Milan Fascio. Colonel Buday, sent by the Albrechtists to Vienna to place propaganda in the Austrian press, made this statement in the Abend printed on November 28:

In a short time Albrecht will be King of Hungary. Fascism is spreading rapidly. Archduke Albrecht, when he was in Rome, came to a complete agreement with Mussolini, who is supporting him. It is agreed that the Archduke will marry the younger sister of Princess Mafalda, so strengthening the future alliance with Italy.

The liberal newspapers in Hungary were furious about this open declaration of a militant Fascism and demanded an explanation from the Archduke. But Albrecht remained silent. He allows his supporters to speak. And they did speak, in fact. Tibor Eckhardt, a Fascist leader, delivered a speech in Parliament, saying: "Yes, we declare openly that we want a Fascist dictatorship, that we admire Mussolini, and we are certain of his support when the hour of action strikes." At the same time, for some mysterious reason, in spite of the violent opposition of the left parties, the Hungarian Government decorated Mussolini with the highest Hungarian order.

Then suddenly strange news came from Rumania. Professor Cuza, on his way to Italy, stopped in Budapest and the Hungarian Fascists gave a banquet in his honor. It seemed almost incomprehensible. The Hungarian Fascists, notorious haters of Rumania, who had preached the necessity of a war against that country, had shouted for "revanche" and killed hundreds of people charged with being Rumanian army spies—these same men suddenly declared that an amicable understanding was necessary with the Rumanian Nationalists, their most bitter enemies. It is, indeed, a strange sight to see the opponents of yesterday embracing each other in the names of Fascism and Mussolini.

As if taking new strength from the march of events in Hungary and Rumania, Fascism in Bavaria was making bold preparations to seize the power by a coup de main. The Frankfurter Zeitung, one of the leading papers not only in Germany but in Europe, printed in its issue of November 19 a sensational article exposing the imminent danger of a Fascist plot. The paper told how Count Salden and Count Moehl, intimates of Prince Rupprecht, visited high official personages in Munich, known to be Fascist sympathizers, asking them what they would do in case Prince Rupprecht, impelled by extremely important motives and encouragement from abroad, felt compelled to seize the power by a coup de main? The next day the Munich Post published new exposures, reporting a meeting of the "Organization Pach" at which the Fascists decided to take action. Generals Muehl and Von Epp were present and declared that Prince Rupprecht was ready. Deputy Dittmann described his secret journey to Italy, saying that the Fascist revolution would be supported by Mussolini and no complications were to be feared; that Prince Rupprecht had an agreement with Archduke Albrecht, who was also about to seize the power. The exposures made a sensation in Germany. The newspapers demanded an investigation. The Fascist press in Bavaria was embarrassed and promised a disavowal from Prince Rupprecht, but Rupprecht declined to make any statements. An investigation was started, but it disclosed only well-known facts, namely, that the Fascist organizations in Bavaria were plotting against the republic and that conspirators and murderers were hard to seize because they were taken in with open arms in Hungary or in Italy. This was the situation in December.

In Hungary Fascist leaders prophesied that the question of the throne would be solved in January. The well-informed Count Apponyi warned Hungary against "a monarchy of adventurers." In Rumania the Cabinet Council decided, on the advice of General Trajan Mosoiu, to refuse a visa for the Fascist leaders in Hungary who wanted to hold a joint meeting with the Rumanian Nationalists in Nagyvárad. Mysterious hints at relations between Archduke Albrecht and Prince Carol began to appear in the press.

This was the state of affairs in Central Europe when Crown Prince Carol's startling abdication became known. The Rumanian Government instituted a severe censorship, but the significant news leaked out and Rumanian newspapers reached the capitals of foreign countries. Simultaneously with the resignation of Carol, Professor Cuza, Rumanian Fascist leader, was arrested, the Government giving no reason for his arrest. Arrests of other Fascist leaders followed. At a meeting of the Crown Council Julius Maniu, leader of the Nationalists (Fascists), demanded that Prince Carol be solemnly asked to revoke his resignation. Nicholas Jorga and Alexander Voivoda-Vajda implored the King to ask the Crown Prince not to provoke a grave crisis and to revoke his abdication, but the King interrupted the speakers and said: "No! It is resolved. Nothing can be done." These details were published by Rumanian newspapers and the censorship was subsequently imposed.

The Fascist plot in Rumania was nipped in the bud. The exposure of the counterfeiting plot was a death blow to the Putsch-preparations of the Hungarian Fascists. The Bavarian movement, of course, is not yet dead, but alone it will not amount to anything. The plotters of this international Fascist uprising have fled. Where to? To Italy, of course. Carol is in Milan. Count Csáky, former Hungarian Minister of War, has gone to Italy. Emery von Nádosy, chief of the Budapest police, was on his way to Milan when he was arrested. French detectives, searching for the counterfeit plotters, went to Milan. Italy is reported to be full of German, Hungarian, and Rumanian Fascist leaders who are wanted by the police. Perhaps they have regular meetings to discuss further possibilities for the formation of the new Roman empire by way of putsches, conspiracies, murders, revolutions, and wars. For the time being their plans have been thwarted. But Fascism has shown that it is not merely a political creed but an international danger, and while Mussolini is in power in Italy peace cannot succeed the era of hatred and wars in Europe.

THE PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S rescue of twenty-five men from the sinking steamer Antioe, at the cost of the lives of two of her own crew and the loss of five life-boats, constitutes one of the most gallant feats in the annals of Atlantic seamanship, one of which all Americans may well be proud. It even surpasses the achievement of her sister ship the President Harding in December last. We believe that the President Roosevelt's master, Captain Fried, broke all records in the length of time—four days—that he stood by the Antioe. When one considers how much speed counts with a mail-carrying passenger liner the financial sacrifice was not inconsiderable. There can, however, be no better advertisement for a line than to have such captains as those of the Roosevelt and the Harding. It is pleasant, too, to record the fact that the North German Lloyd liner Bremen made an equally gallant attempt to succor the British ship Laristan, from which she did pluck six men, the others perishing when their vessel sank at night. The German skipper's skill in picking up the Laristan with only slight indications as to her whereabouts has compelled the admiration of the shipping world. What a happy change from a few years ago to have German sailors risking their lives to save some of their former enemies! As to Captain Fried, his success is all the more noteworthy because of the cockleshell life-boats that are carried by most liners. It would seem that every line ought to be willing to place on board each ship some specially equipped non-capsizable motor life-boats of the type used by our Coast Guard.

THE SUCCESSFUL FLIGHT of the Spanish aviator, Commander Ramon Franco, and his companions from Spain to South America is another notable event in the history of aviation. With comparatively little fuss and feathers, and only three or four warships to patrol the course, they took their long jump, 1,432 miles, from the Cape Verde Islands to the island of Fernando de Noronha in fifteen hours. The flight to Pernambuco was a matter of only 279 miles. Not unnaturally the Spaniards are elated by this successful feat. Already they are talking of a cross-Atlantic dirigible line based at Seville. The airport soon to be built there is to cost 31,000,000 pesetas. But it is not the commercial prospects which are thrilling the Spaniards today. They are particularly happy that Spanish adventurers have been the first to cross the South Atlantic in spite of the familiar Nordic sneers at all Latins, and they see in it another strong tie with South America, even if it should prove to be only a sentimental one.

MR. HOOVER seems to have put all the blame for high tire-prices on the British Government's rubber monopoly. But in doing so he has told only half the story of prices, and the smaller half at that. Now comes Representative Shallenberger with the other—and more important—half. He sat on the committee to which Mr. Hoover appealed. He says: "There is about ten pounds of crude rubber in the average standard tire. The British rubber control has advanced the average price of that crude rubber about fifty cents a pound. That accounts for a $5 advance in the cost of making a tire. But a thirty-three by six Goodrich balloon tire and tube which cost $30 before the British advance now costs $54, or an increase to the American buyer of $24. We have found that the Englishman got the $5, but who got the other $19?" Some light on the mystery is thrown by recent profit-and-loss accounts. In regard to them Mr. Shallenberger goes on to say: "The big tire companies all show the greatest net profits for 1925 of any year in their history. The Fisk Company more than doubled their previous profits; Goodrich netted $15,000,000; Firestone earned 26 per cent; United Rubber 25 per cent. . . . It seems to me that instead of investigating English rubber we had better get after the American tire manufacturer." What have you to say to this, Mr. Hoover?

WARREN WORTH BAILEY is being kept out of his seat in Congress by one of those miserable technicalities of the law which so constantly bring American justice into contempt. On the face of the returns in the congressional election of 1924 in the twentieth Pennsylvania district Mr. Bailey was beaten by about twenty-seven votes. An official count, which he demanded, developed errors in the returns which gave to Mr. Bailey a clear majority of fourteen. Twenty-four hours later his opponent, Mr. Walters, demanded of the courts a certificate of election based on the original returns, on the ground that the computation board, which made the official count, had exceeded its powers in opening certain boxes and correcting errors. No one has questioned the accuracy of the recount, but for nearly fifteen months Mr. Bailey has been deprived of his seat because the courts have been passing upon whether in a congressional election canvassing boards can go behind the returns to correct errors or detect fraud in order to obtain a true count. It is, of course, of the utmost importance that the election of Mr. Bailey be upheld, not only because he is morally and legally entitled to his seat, but because, if canvassing boards may not go behind the returns in congressional elections, the door is thrown wide open to fraud and corruption. One of the worst features, moreover, is that although Mr. Bailey is obviously the winner of the contest the whole burden and expense of the litigation have been placed upon him instead of upon his antagonist. The matter is now before Congress, and there, too, it seems as if every possible delay were being contrived in order to keep Mr. Bailey out of his seat.

IF A THOUSAND SOLDIERS are necessary in Kentucky to see that justice is done one Negro accused of a revolting crime, a determined Governor is ready to furnish them. Eight companies of infantry with appropriate artillery were called out to protect John Henry Jones, black, confessed murderer of a man and his two children and attacker of his wife. A courageous sheriff and a posse of obstinate men refused to give up their prisoner to a mob and beat off the Negro fellow-convicts who sought to lynch him in the jail. There is, in this case, no doubt that the crime was committed by the accused; it was a hideous and bestial act without any mitigating circumstances; if ever a lynching seemed justified, here was the time. But a lynching is never justified in a state that calls itself civilized, and Governor Fields is evidently bound that Kentucky shall deserve that appellation. The time will come, undoubtedly, when it will not be necessary to call out troops in order that simple justice may be done; but the South has a long and dark record of dealing without the law, and men do not learn to change completely overnight. Meanwhile Kentucky lines up with Mississippi in an honest, brave, and forthright attempt to clean house.

AFTER TWELVE YEARS in prison Richard Ford has been acquitted in California of the murder of a deputy whom no one ever thought he had actually killed. The question, of course, was not a simple killing: it was whether, as leader of a protest meeting at a hop-pickers' camp that turned into a riot at which two deputies and two workers were shot, Ford could have been called the murderer of the deputies. At his trial for the death of the first deputy in 1913, a jury found Ford guilty of murder; his life sentence was commuted last fall but he was immediately rearrested, charged with the murder of the second officer. He has just been acquitted. Ford is therefore, in the eyes of the law, guilty of murdering one deputy and not of murdering the other, and has in addition twelve years of prison to remember. But perhaps belated justice is better than none at all; and a return to some degree of sanity in California cannot be unwelcome. In Pittsburgh they are still jailing men for sedition; the first of nine men accused of "distributing pamphlets and belonging to an organization advocating the overthrow of the government" has been found guilty. Presumably the other eight will be convicted. So the nervous tremors of our officials continue, sedition laws remain firm upon our statute books, and when occasionally a ray of common sense—as in the Ford case—pierces the gloom of panic we must be astonished; we cannot expect, as a matter of course, justice and dignity in trials involving popular prejudice.

NEW THAT COMMUNISM was raging at Ohio State University set the venerable authorities by the ears. But a thorough investigation of the alleged seditious and "red" activities of certain members of the faculty ought certainly to have allayed their fears forever. Thus Professor Albert R. Chandler testified that he "had joined the Committee of 48 which seemed to be behind an effort to revive the Roosevelt Progressive Party"; this had evidently been the extent of Professor Chandler's dangerous acts; said he: "No good professor is likely to indorse the present government of Russia, nor to lead his students to do so." Mr. Chandler does not, he testified, consider the Committee of 48 either socialistic or communistic. Professor H. G. Hayes of the economics department was asked to testify because he teaches a course in socialism; but Mr. Hayes, too, was quick to deny any really socialistic yearnings: "Because I teach a course called socialism does not mean that I am a socialist. I never have voted for any other than a Republican or a Democratic candidate except on one occasion when I voted for a Prohibitionist." Asked if he advocated socialism in his classes, Mr. Hayes replied: "Indeed, no. I usually have two or three out of my class of twenty-five who are confirmed socialists at the beginning of the course, but for the most part . . . I believe they change their opinions before the course is completed." All the faculty united in declaring the student body more law-abiding than it had been in years, and in denying that there was any prevalence of drinking; and none of them had ever heard of one of their own number who was a socialist or communist. Thus is Ohio State discovered to be 100 per cent pure.

WILLIAM B. WARD, our baking king, has decided to sugar-coat the trust pill he has prepared by giving to the board of directors of his gigantic company the power to make contributions from their surplus or net profits for the erection or maintenance of one or more hospitals, infirmaries, or homes for invalid or aged employees of the company. More than that, whenever a full dividend (7 per cent) has been paid upon the preferred stock, some of the surplus is to be used "for the advancement of the right of every child to be born well, to grow to maturity physically and mentally fit for American citizenship, and generally for the advancement of the health and welfare of the American people, and dividends upon the common stock may then be declared out of the remainder of surplus or net profits." We admit that this is unique in company financing and promoting, but much as we are interested in the welfare of the American child and the American people somehow or other we cannot rejoice about it, particularly the provision that the gift to the children shall come before the common-stock dividends. This is mixing philanthropy and business, and however well meant it may be—we credit Mr. Ward with a genuine zest for well-doing—we cannot but feel that it is a mistake, if only because it will be accepted by the public as an effort to still criticism and to pave the way for an even greater control of the staff of life of the American people.

FRENCH FINANCE and, therefore, France's entire national life, is in a more hopeful position. No acceptable program for balancing the budget has yet been found by Parliament, it is true, but the state of the public mind seems to have changed in a way that is encouraging. From the Treaty of Versailles to the fall of Poincaré the French people lived under the fatal illusion that Germany was going to pay their debts. Then they struggled on for months under the equally evanescent dream that nobody need pay them. Early this winter, when one finance minister after another had gone down in the vain attempt to devise an acceptable program, and with the franc falling catastrophically, it looked as if the entire financial fabric might collapse before the people woke. Happily the national psychology seems to have changed. Three months ago the French were asking, Shall we pay taxes? Now they are asking, Who shall pay taxes? That is a great advance. Fortunately, also, Premier Briand will not make the acceptance of the plan of Paul Doumer, his Minister of Finance, one of ministerial confidence. He is willing to take the Doumer plan or that of the Left Bloc, as the Chamber decides. So there is hope that some scheme for balancing the budget will win. Probably it will be a compromise, with the poor man, as usual, carrying the heavy end. But even for the poor man this may be better than a collapse of the national finances. Meanwhile the exchange value of the franc has remained in a position of virtual equilibrium for some weeks, a situation which, if it continues, should assist decidedly in straightening out the financial tangle.

IF THE FRENCH, as part of their financial measures, should enact the proposal to raise their import duties 30 per cent, how our protectionists would rejoice, especially as France buys more from us than from any other country and in 1925 imported goods valued at 6,382,900,000 francs! The action would, of course, put our American manufacturers to their trumps, unless perhaps they were prepared to do some wholesale dumping. Well, it is all part of the after-war madness. Some Frenchmen think their country could raise several hundred millions of francs by such tariff levies—provided, of course, that the demand for foreign goods continued after French consumers realized that those products cost them 30 per cent more. It is interesting to note that the conservative French dailies are not to be fooled as to what the scheme would mean to the French buyer. Thus the Temps declares that "of all taxes on consumption, customs duties are the most detestable," points out that the yield has always been mediocre, and correctly asserts that such duties immediately send up domestic prices and thereby increase the cost of living. Finally the Temps indicates the possibility (it could well say probability) of commercial conflicts, of the cancelation by other countries of existing treaties, and of trade reprisals. The Temps, at least, has gone to the heart of the protection folly.

EGYPT, like various other oppressed nations, has two governments. One cooperates happily and profitably with the oppressor; the other pretends at least to represent the majority. When Ziwar Pasha, present Premier of Egypt and head of the pro-British Unionist Party, returned from Europe last fall he ordered the Parliament dispersed. Its membership too generally supported Zaghlul Pasha and the policy of complete independence. Thereupon the Zaghlulist members, about 130 of them, met under the leadership of Zaghlul himself, declared themselves the Parliament, adopted resolutions, and adjourned. They have not met since. Meanwhile, the Ziwar Cabinet has promulgated a new election law and is preparing for a nation-wide election designed to produce a more amenable and loyal Parliament. In order to carry out the polling, the provincial mayors, called omdehs, must make out lists of electors. Several hundred omdehs have refused to do this. Many have been arrested, tried, and fined, and, on their promise to comply with the instructions, permitted to return to office. No sooner are they back on the job than they renounce their promise and try passive resistance again. The Zaghlul Party may obtain a majority in the coming elections in spite of the Government's elaborate precautions. The feeling against the British and the present subservient cabinet is bitter. Recently when King Fuad passed through the streets of Cairo in an open carriage he was greeted with shouts of "Long live Zaghlul!" If the Zaghlulists win the election, or if passive resistance increases, the British authorities, through the strong arm of the High Commissioner, will doubtless take the necessary measures to "maintain order" and "support the Government." And the joke of Egyptian independence will become manifest to the world.

THE DEATH of Anna Kuliscioff in Milan on December 29 brings grief not only to Filippo Turati and to their daughter but to all who remember this remarkable Russian as the outstanding figure in the struggles of Italian liberalism from 1878 to 1912. Then, broken in health, she was forced to give up her dramatic career as a Socialist leader and the founder of the woman's movement in Italy. A political exile from Russia at seventeen, she was active among the refugees in Switzerland, and had served a prison sentence in Paris when she went to Italy to study medicine and take an active part in the liberating movement. Arrested by the Italian police, she baffled the judges with her keenness of mind. Though finally acquitted, her fourteen months of imprisonment had permanently shattered her health. But this did not stop her work. She completed her medical studies at the University of Naples. Then she practiced obstetrics as a profession while she brought up her own baby at home and continued to lecture and write for the Socialist Party. In 1891 she and Turati founded Critica Sociale. In 1898 her work was interrupted by a year in prison. After her release she devoted herself more and more to the problem of the proletarian woman. The law on woman and child labor, passed in 1904, was her work. She started the first women's newspaper in Italy in 1909. The following tribute is paid to her by Lavoro (Genoa): "Whatever great and good things have been accomplished by Italian socialism (and there have been many) were initiated and made possible by her; all the errors made by Italian socialism (and there have been many) were denounced by her, and would have been avoided if her advice had been followed." In spirits such as hers lies not only the hope of Italy but the hope of the world.

Our Mexican Diplomacy

FOR fifteen years the diplomatic relationship of the United States with its one independent land neighbor has been a story of continuous official ineptitude. During a period analogous in the Mexican national existence with our revolutionary and confederation days, our administrations have been generally antagonistic in spirit, frequently hostile in word and deed, consistently supercilious and bullying, and always profoundly stupid in their attitude toward Mexico's efforts to shake off the shackles of a medieval feudalism and secure the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness that belong to free peoples.

The connivance of Ambassador Henry Lane Wilson in the overthrow of Madero and the seating of a bloody butcher in the Mexican presidential chair forms one of the blackest and most sordid chapters in our foreign relations. President Wilson, though wise enough to dismiss that diplomatist, was himself responsible for the needless slaughter at Vera Cruz of several hundred Mexicans, most of them little more than boys, and of seventeen Americans.

Then came Mr. Fall. But even after his well-oiled exit into oblivion Secretary Hughes persisted in seeking to impose on Mexico a legislative program conceived in petroleum and dedicated to the proposition that American property rights take precedence over Mexican national needs and aspirations. Recognition was granted only grudgingly in response to overwhelming public sentiment in the United States and the exigencies of a presidential campaign.

What might then have become an era of unprecedented good-feeling and mutual cooperation between the two governments—a friendliness already established and steadily growing between the two peoples—was marred by the monumental Kellogg-Sheffield blunder in June last. But the stinging rebuff from the American press, 80 per cent of which indorsed the Calles stand against its own government, taught Mr. Kellogg nothing.

In November, last, the American embassy viewed the proposed Mexican petroleum legislation with such anticipatory alarm that an informal communication to the Mexican Government suggested that its enactment would affect the good relations between the two countries and render a continuation of the policy initiated during President Obregon's regime impossible. Implied, of course, was the threat to withdraw recognition.

It should be understood that Mexico's legislation in this and many other matters prescribed by the Constitution of 1917 has been long delayed—largely because of constant pressure from Washington. The provisions of that document, which the Mexicans rightly consider as the Magna Charta of their emancipation, form the basis for the country's fundamental laws. The bone of contention in the new oil law which enacts a portion of Article 27—vesting the subsoil rights in the nation—is that the petroleum rights acquired prior to 1917 in fee will become leaseholds at the end of fifty years. The oil in the properties involved is four-fifths exhausted. At the present rate of production it will be non-existent in five years. To assert that such a provision is confiscatory and retroactive is, at best, the quintessence of legalism. But whatever the purely technical aspects, similar and far more confiscatory laws relating to foreign-property holdings have been enacted in many American States. No foreign government questions our right so to legislate.

The Mexican Government replied setting forth its view that the legislation is not confiscatory and retroactive and citing many analogies and precedents from our own legislation. Such an exchange of views would appear a proper way of arriving at an understanding were not the American efforts—apart from the threatening implications of our first note—accompanied, as always, with collateral and gravely prejudicial manifestations.

The Washington Post, looked upon as a quasi-official spokesman for the State Department, on January 11 sent up a trial balloon in the shape of an editorial violently denouncing the "communist" Mexican Government and the proposed legislation, ending with this significant paragraph:

A respectable portion of the Mexican people detests the communist movement and would overthrow it if opportunity afforded. Many influential army officers are disgusted with the communization of the national army. It is quite possible that the communist excesses will drive the Mexican people to revolt, in which case Calles would be succeeded by an executive willing to fulfil international obligations and capable of doing so. If the Calles administration should proceed with its confiscatory plans despite the American protest it would be the duty of the United States to withdraw recognition, sever diplomatic relations, and interpose no obstacle to a movement by the Mexican people to set up a responsible republican government.

While a few of the rebels surviving from the De la Huerta revolt, amply financed, slip across the border and make an abortive attempt to capture a barracks, an incident which lends itself easily to magnifying in the press dispatches, one of the confidential news services in Washington which presumes to give the "straight inside dope" sends out the report that "a revolution is brewing in Mexico, financed by conservatives, due to break around the middle of March, causing only temporary disturbance to business." It was Secretary Kellogg himself in his newspaper statement of June 12, last, who first suggested the possibility of impending rebellion in Mexico.

Needless to say this information is as false as the gruesome picture painted by the Post. Communism is non-existent in Mexican government circles, while the Mexican labor movement has drastically combated its sporadic manifestations. On the contrary, the Calles Government, while adhering unflinchingly to its wholly moderate, pledged program of land reform, education, labor organization, and revindication of national rights, has leaned over backward in its efforts to satisfy its foreign and domestic creditors and to reestablish peace and security for life and property.

One can hardly expect a Secretary of State who has never exhibited a bowing acquaintance with traditional American principles to be interested in the development of democracy and self-government, in the land of our neighbor. But a modicum of intelligence would indicate, in the interest of American investments which are his only concern, the advisability of supporting the regime in Mexico which is successfully building an orderly political and economic structure on the ruins of the past. Fortunately, Mr. Kellogg's press feelers have shown that the American people are better informed about Mexico than he is and do not desire to impair friendly relations with neighbors in behalf of a handful of concessionnaires. Senator La Follette's resolution, meanwhile, is an attempt to bring into the daylight of open diplomacy the communications that have passed between the two governments, publication of which by the Mexican Government has so far been withheld out of courtesy for the State Department's wishes. Mr. Kellogg's sudden shyness has one gratifying implication: he realizes that he has again blundered and would like to withdraw as quietly and inconspicuously as possible from the blustering position to which he has committed our Government.

Mr. Norris Indicts the President

BY all odds the most serious charge yet brought against Calvin Coolidge was that made by Senator Norris of Nebraska in his speech in the Senate on January 23. In its essence, it is that, for political reasons, the President, then being a candidate for reelection, asked William S. Culbertson of the Tariff Commission to delay the report on the sugar tariff until after the election. The Tariff Commission is a semi-judicial body. It was created by Congress to pass upon the tariff schedules in the interest of the protected manufacturers and also of the public, and to do so scientifically and independently of both the Executive and the Congress. Mr. Norris charged and proved—no denial of any kind has come from the White House—that the commission, standing three to two in favor of reporting to the President a reduction of the sugar tariff, every effort was made to bribe, cajole, and threaten Mr. Culbertson to withhold the report in direct violation of his duty as a public official.

The facts, as Senator Norris proved them by Mr. Culbertson's own contemporary memoranda, are as follows:

1. The Tariff Commission was first deadlocked, three to three on the sugar report.

2. Mr. Glassie of Louisiana being disqualified on the initiative of Mr. Culbertson, because it appeared that his family owned $200,000 worth of stock in a sugar corporation, the commission stood three to two in favor of sending the sugar-tariff report to Mr. Coolidge.

3. An offensive against Mr. Culbertson was begun.

(a) He was summoned to a conference by Senator Smoot at which he found between fifteen and twenty persons, among them another sugar Senator and a Representative; the rest were business men interested in sugar. At this conference Mr. Culbertson, being both a judge and juror, was subjected to pressure and told how these parties to the suit desired him and his associates to proceed.

(b) Next Mr. Culbertson was summoned to the White House by the Secretary to the President and before him was held out an appointment in the diplomatic service which Mr. Culbertson had long coveted. Mr. Slomp dangled before him the possibility of his appointment as Minister to China or as Agent General of Reparations or as Governor General of the Philippines. Prior to that interview he had also been offered a position on the Federal Trade Commission.

(c) Mr. Culbertson, having agreed to deliver some lectures at Georgetown University and the Williamstown Institute of Politics, suddenly found the legality of these actions challenged. An Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Martin, assured two of Mr. Culbertson's associates, Messrs. Lewis and Costigan, that he had not violated the law, that an opinion favoring him had been drawn and was to be signed by the Attorney General that day (July 21, 1924). Three days later Messrs. Lewis and Costigan were invited to see Attorney General Stone at once; when they arrived there lay before him an adverse opinion as to Mr. Culbertson. When they asked for delay in order to present their views in writing, Mr. Stone refused to hold the opinion because he had been ordered to send it to the President at once.

(d) The next day (July 25, 1924) Mr. Culbertson was summoned to the White House. Mr. Coolidge discussed with him the Attorney General's unfavorable opinion as to his lecturing and with it as a threat asked Mr. Culbertson to delay the sugar report which it was the Commissioner's duty to present.

(e) Mr. Culbertson refusing, he was later appointed Minister to Rumania but not until the sugar-tariff report had gone to the President, who pigeonholed and did not act on it for eight months, that is, until the presidential election had come and gone.

It seems to us that there is no mistaking the facts here set forth; the President deliberately tried to threaten and bribe an office-holder of the United States to withhold a semi-judicial opinion simply and solely because of the effect it might have upon his political fortunes. In a lesser person Mr. Coolidge's action in threatening Mr. Culbertson as he did might easily be termed blackmail. Yet because of the paralysis of the critical faculty in our press and our public men, and the partisanship of the Republican organs, there has been scarcely any editorial comment upon this performance of the President. Had such a charge been brought against Grover Cleveland or Benjamin Harrison or William H. Taft or Woodrow Wilson, it would just about have wrecked their administrations. Fortunately for the sake of the truth, Senator Norris has lived up to his reputation of fearlessly defending our American institutions and castigating misconduct in office, whether in the White House or anywhere else.

Our Financial Battle-Line

WITHIN the last few years we Americans have been somewhat startled, rather proud, and not a little puzzled to discover that we have become the controlling financial power of the world, a great creditor nation instead of a debtor country; that a host of persons abroad are paying us an annual tribute in interest, and that we are approaching the position of the king in his counting-house with nothing more laborious to do than "counting out his money." Hard work and good fortune have combined in about equal parts to transform us in 150 years from a poverty-stricken band of insignificant colonists into a position of world dictatorship and hitherto unknown affluence. Our natural resources were the most splendid, probably, with which any country has ever been endowed. To subdue them Europe contributed some 30,000,000 immigrants (12,000,000 from 1900 to 1920) raised to manhood at her expense and given to us in the prime of life for nothing. We ourselves supplied the industry, the intelligence, and the discipline to weld out of this our present greatness.

There is no minimizing that greatness of its significance. The United States today produces a quarter of the world's wheat, half of its iron and coal, three-fifths of its aluminum, copper, and cotton, two-thirds of its oil, three-fourths of its corn, and nine-tenths of its automobiles. Our national wealth, which in 1850 was placed at about seven billion dollars, was estimated by the Census Bureau as 322 billions in 1922. Our national income is believed to be as great as that of Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, and Germany all rolled together. The growth of our wealth and income has been especially marked since the beginning of this century, at which time, roughly speaking, our change began from a pastoral and agricultural community into a manufacturing and financial power. Whatever the course of events, the United States was doubtless destined to become the dominant commercial power of the twentieth century, as Great Britain was of the nineteenth, but that destiny was acutely accentuated by the World War. In the year 1914, despite our rapid rise as an industrial power, we were still a debtor nation. Already our foreign investments were placed at more than $2,500,000,000, but the Comptroller of the Currency estimated that overseas investors held from four to five billion dollars' worth of American securities, which left a substantial balance against us.

During and after the war an Aladdinlike change occurred, the extent and significance of which is just beginning to be appreciated. Our profits have been so phenomenal that we have not only put a vast sum of new capital into enlarging our industrial plant but have been obliged to send great sums abroad for investment. Private American investment abroad now totals more than ten billion dollars, in addition to which the United States Government has loaned sums to foreign states which with accumulated interest now amount to some twelve billions. Thus in a little over a decade we have increased our foreign holdings nearly tenfold.

The political responsibilities and complications of this situation, obviously tremendous, are suggested in two recent books, "Dollar Diplomacy," by Scott Nearing and Joseph Freeman, and "American Foreign Investments," by Robert W. Dunn.* The authors of the first book expressly disclaim that it is a history of American imperialism, but it is an excellent presentation for the general reader of the rise, scope, and possibilities of its most important phases. Mr. Dunn's volume, chiefly statistical and documentary, is a mine for the student who wants to dig into the subject for himself. Both volumes raise issues with which Americans who want to know where their country is going should become familiar. The United States has begun a career of financial and economic direction and dictation of the world. There is no stopping it by moral appeals or political expedients. The United States is the culmination and the stronghold of the profits system of industry. Its course is inevitable and unchangeable unless the profits system itself is abandoned or until it comes head on into collision with a rival method that is better and more vital.

The only better methods now visible seem to lie in the direction of cooperative production and distribution by large groups on a voluntary non-political basis, or in government control. Probably a combination of the two, wherever one or the other may be realized, presents the greatest immediate possibilities. Certainly those who refuse to accept one or the other of these methods, and yet hope to save their country from becoming a world tyrant and oppressor, are unaware of the facts or lost in sophistries.

The Bottom of the Well

THE pleasure of reading a very good poem is equaled only by that of reading a very bad one. Some persons consider the second pleasure infinitely greater and purer than the first, and it would be difficult to prove them wrong, though it would be easy to call them perverse. We hope that we commit no sin against humanity or good taste when we confess that we enjoyed the worst poems submitted in The Nation's poetry contest, just concluded, quite as much as we enjoyed those which we were bold enough to vote the best. For the middling pieces there is not so much to be said. Average poems, like average people, are dull beyond discussion. But if we admired the clear waters at the top of the well whose depths we sounded, we also felt affection for the honest gravel at the bottom.

There was the historical ballad, for instance, which informed us that

When it was known that Polk was the Presidential nominee,
The news was flashed the wires o'er
To Washington from Baltimore, and which went on to treat of the various problems confronting Polk once he was elected:

After Polk's inauguration,
The first work for consideration
That was of real vital concern,
Was right to Oregon confirm. . . .

Just before inauguration
Congress approved the annexation
Of Texas to the Union, tho
Not approved by Mexico.

The author of the foregoing stanzas may or may not have wanted us to smile. Probably he did not. But another ballad-writer, to judge by internal evidence which there is no space to spread upon the record, was certainly serious from the first word of his contribution to the last. The reader may guess the extent to which this solemnity was contagious from the following stanza:

Oh, a shipwrecked sailor am I!
For my ship has sunk to the bottom of the sea
And if you will give me your kind attention please
I will spin you a yarn that is worth a piece of cheese.

The last two lines here were worth considering as an attempt to convey a nonchalant, even a cynical, view of all that is most familiar in romantic verse. But in view of the true tragedy which was developed in the course of succeeding stanzas we had to pronounce the couplet a failure and proceed to another piece whose purpose was definitely comic. It seems that

Once upon a time there was a learned doc,
Who never deigned to wear other than silk sock,
And who graced his noble brow with purple lock,
And kept his time one hour off the local clock.

But his pride went before a fall. For

When it came that he should fall badly ill
He phoned the apothecary for quinine pill
And of them he did take half a gill
And now other doctors are trying their skill.

Our smiles were broader at this point than even the author, perhaps, had hoped they would be. So on and on. To anyone afflicted with melancholy we recommend a poetry contest of his own. The Muses will save him, or nothing can.

Letters from Tolstoi

Translated by HERMAN GEORGE SCHEFFAUER

[These letters, hitherto unpublished, were written between the years 1894 and 1910 to Eugen Heinrich Schmitt of Budapest, author of books on philosophy and leader of a group called the League of Gnostics. Schmitt was the editor of a small weekly, Ohne Staat, a philosophical anarchist paper, which opposed all forms of service to the state—especially military service. He was a social and political idealist and close to Tolstoi in many of his beliefs. The letters in this series, written originally in German, were obtained from his widow, now living in Berlin. They will appear consecutively in several issues of The Nation.]

I

August 18/30, 1894

DEAR SIR:

I have long since received your letter and your pamphlet "Mammon and Belial," and I thank you heartily for both. I believe the time has now come for us to devote the greatest energy to the end of destroying the basic falsehoods upon which all the evils of our human society are established, as you already attempt to do in your pamphlet. The greatest enemy of truth, and therefore of true progress, is today not ignorance, but the treacherous compromises which have made their way into all conditions of life. To expose these and to express the truth about life in a brief, clear, and simple form must be the most urgent and most important activity of our time.

I shall have your pamphlet translated and give it the greatest possible circulation. I would also like to have some idea of your journal. I am not able to subscribe to it, because of the censorship, but if you would send it to Professor Nicolai Grott, at the University of Moscow, I should be most grateful and would at once send the fee to the address given. God aid you in your courageous and beneficent work.

October 6/18, 1894

DEAR SIR:

I received your letter with the open appeal. In all frankness the appeal did not please me. From it I can obtain no clear conception of the religious Weltanschauung of the members of your league. I hope to find this more exactly defined in the periodical. I have not yet received this. The description of your personal affairs interested me exceedingly. The position which every man must adopt who earnestly accepts the true and only religion of our time—whether this be called Christian or the Religion of the Spirit—and serves this religion in his daily life, is the same everywhere. I am convinced that the most important as well as the most difficult thing for those of us who would serve truth is not the interpretation of religious principles but the carrying-out of these principles in our actual life.

As to your relationship to the intelligentsia and to the laboring classes—things are precisely the same with us. The intelligentsia seeks salvation where no salvation is to be found, and as a matter of fact it is not quite sincere in its activity—it wishes to do good without sacrificing any of its advantages. The workers who incline to the socialistic creed endeavor to change the present condition of things not because it is unjust and prejudicial to love, but simply because justice in this case would bring them certain advantages. Salvation, I believe, will come neither from the workmen who are socialistically inclined nor from their leaders, but only from people who will accept religion as their only guide in life, as the Nazarenes in Serbia and others in certain places in Austria do—namely, that hundreds of them refuse to take the oath and do military service and are condemned for this to spend years in prisons and fortresses. It is only from such men as these who are ready to give up their lives for their convictions that salvation will come. Men like these are to be found everywhere and we ourselves must become such men in order to fulfil our destinies and to imbue others with our spirit.

I believe that you are such a man and therefore I am most happy to be in direct contact with you. My letters are badly written and they are not worth publishing. But as soon as opportunity presents itself I shall write something for your paper and send it to you.

February 1/13, 1895

DEAR FRIEND:

I received your letters and was overjoyed to hear the good news contained in them. Your work, our work, that is to say God's work, makes great progress in your hands. I may say the same in respect not only to Russia, but also to England (Kenworthy, Morrison), Lachmann (Denmark), Sweden and Finland (Ernefeld).

I thank you heartily for your two pamphlets which please me greatly, especially "The Hunt," and in a still greater degree the suit-at-law which arose from this. I cannot, however, say the same with regard to "The Catechism of the Religion of the Spirit." Although there is not a single point on which I do not agree, yet I would have liked to see more profundity in the whole and as a consequence more unity. Nevertheless, I send you my cordial thanks not only for the message but also for the book. It will serve to help many people to establish this new, more rational and sublime Weltanschauung. Both pamphlets shall be translated into Russian and will appear in our journal which is published here—not in a printed, but a hand-written form.

I regret that I have so far not received the periodical. No doubt the censorship got hold of it. Please send this if possible, as well as all other things, to me in care of Professor Grott at the University of Moscow. And please be so good as to convey my gratitude and my love to all our friends and fellows in the faith.

I have a short article, actually a letter upon the subject of the relation between faith and reason, which I can let you have, if you wish. But please let me know if you have a good translator from the Russian at hand, or whether I shall send you the article in German.

IV

DEAR FRIEND:

I have received your letter with number 5 of your periodical, and have read your article upon Egidy. Like all your writings this pleased me as a whole very much. I am especially delighted with the sincerity and fire of your writings, but what you mention on pages 144 and 145 in relation to your Weltanschauung I could not approve. One can never rightly estimate the importance of one's own thoughts; one must leave that to others. But your point of view is not your own but the Christian as we must deduce it from the New Testament if we read this without any preconceived intention. Your merit consists in this—that you have illuminated this Weltanschauung from a new side. Excuse me, my dear friend, for permitting myself to make these remarks. I do this only because I love you and treasure your activity very highly and expect great things of it.

My friend Makovizky has, I hope, already sent you the preface which you may publish in your periodical—if you wish. I am now sending you a small correspondence written by a friend of mine upon the persecution of the Dukhobors with a short article written by me in relation to this matter. The correspondence is too long for publication in your magazine, but if you think well of it you might make an extract and print it with my article as an afterword.

The correspondence, however, I should like to see published in the German, Austrian, and Prussian newspapers of greatest circulation with my short letter or with the appendix.

Should this translation and the sending about of this correspondence cause you too much trouble then please send it to Makovizky who will attend to everything. I am writing to him by the same post.

Your friend—who loves you with all his heart,

DEAR FRIEND:

I have received your letter with the number of the publication and I have read the article entitled Christ and Buddha with great interest. The article contains a great deal that is valuable and new respecting the basic principles of both religions, of which we hear so much, and the essential difference between the religion of pity and the religion of love has been adjudged most correctly by you.

In the same issue I find an article upon the text: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's." Some years ago I wrote a short article upon the false interpretation of this text, and I believe that this has never been translated into German. The article will be sent you from Geneva and if you wish you can publish it in your review.

DEAR FRIEND:

You must forgive me for not having answered your letter for so long a time. The death of my child and the sickness of my wife and my own which followed it and from which I have just recovered, were the causes of the delay. I have received all the letters and other things you sent me, and as I remember I replied to your pamphlet "Herodes." But however this may be, I shall now answer your letter of June 20.

The attitude which the Social-Democrats adopt toward you is nothing new to me. It is only a proof that your work is important and that for this reason it appears dangerous to the Social-Democrats. I am sorry that you must suffer calumny for this. But you must not lose heart nor give up the publication of your paper. Every number that I receive I read through with the greatest interest and pleasure. Your article upon anarchy I shall also have translated. It pleased me particularly. A few weeks ago I had begun a paper upon the simplest and most accessible means of redemption from the bondage in which we live, and this essay would have been precisely what you desire for your periodical. But now I am occupied with other labors. But as soon as I am done with these I shall complete this article with the keenest pleasure and send it to you for publication.

As to the international edition I have as yet begun nothing, but I have not given up the idea.

DEAR FRIEND:

My friend Popov, the author of the biography of Drojin, asks me not to publish the foreword to his book which I sent you in my last letter through Makovizky. For this reason I repeat what I communicated in my telegram: Not to translate this article nor to publish it in your paper. The essay upon the Dukhobors you must have received by this time. The more this correspondence as well as my afterword is disseminated the better. I received your last letters. . . .

DEAR FRIEND:

Please forgive me for not having written you for so long. I have received your book "The Secret of Christ" and then the latest number of the Religion of the Spirit. The form of the first-mentioned did not please me very much, but I am wholly in accord with you in the matter of your article Love Your Enemies.

As to the remarks of your Russian friend you may have these printed but not in my name nor in the name of the author of the correspondence about the Dukhobors. The success of your endeavors gives me great joy, although on such occasions I always think of St. Luke x, 20, where it is said that the disciples have not joy, etc.

It is so natural and dangerous to deceive ourselves, and indeed we are inclined to give undue importance to such happenings as seem desirable to us. And it is still more dangerous to attribute these to outer rather than to inner events and now, when I see how the truth is given the same recognition from all sides I remember this great saying.

Labor Capitalism—Where Does It Lead?

By CEDRIC LONG

ORGANIZED labor is "buying into" capitalism. And capitalism, in turn, is energetically at the business of "taking labor into partnership." There is a strong movement toward the center from both directions; with the pace getting faster every year.

Scarcely a week passes without the news that organized labor is flirting with a new phase of capitalist finance. A new labor-trust company, a national labor bank, or an investment company is started. A union purchases a thirty-five million dollar office building or acquires a controlling interest in a mammoth Wall Street bank or a coal mine in West Virginia or forty-nine thousand acres of Florida real estate.

Meanwhile, on the extreme right we see efforts equally frantic. Statistics are marshaled to demonstrate that since 1918 public utilities alone have added three and a half million stockholders (including 500,000 employees) to their rolls and two and a half million bondholders. Huge corporations of every kind are seeking out bigger, better, and brighter methods for a wider and more democratic distribution of their stock. College professors, railroad presidents, and bankers vie with one another in quoting figures to prove that ownership and control of industry and finance are rapidly being transferred to the common men and women of the country.

Employee ownership of traction companies; labor partnership in railroad management; labor financiers; labor landlordism; labor capitalism—What is it? Where did it come from? Where is it going?

At first glance it would seem self-evident to those who distrust the system that if capitalism itself is a menace to society, labor capitalism or its counterpart, "democratic stock distribution," is no royal road to the Cooperative Commonwealth. These moves merely give us a broader and stronger foundation for the capitalist system; and economic democracy does not figure at all. Whether we happen to be residing on the left or on the right side of the road, once we fall in line behind this popular bandwagon we are enlisted in the campaign to see that capitalism is more firmly entrenched than ever in the economic life of the country.

For the main end and aim of that particular form of organization which we know as the capitalist corporation is to subordinate all the other interests of the economic order to the interests of the financial investor. The producers in industry take the fixed wage that is given them; the consumers pay the price that is assigned; the borrower pays the interest rate demanded; the tenant pays the rent set for him. But the profits, the surplus remaining after all expenses are paid, the rewards of business go to the stockholders, the investors. Possession of stock carries ownership, it conveys control, it commands the profits. And the owner of 10,000 shares gets ten thousand times the control and ten thousand times the profits returned to the owner of one share. Capitalism not only scorns the principle of equality as between stockholders, producers, and consumers; it scorns the equality principle between capitalists themselves. While the farmers and workers of the country think they are taking control of capitalism, in reality capitalism is taking control of them. Economic democracy under capitalism does not exist, nor can permanent justice for producers or consumers ever be born of it.

But let us be more specific. Here are a few concrete instances of capitalism at work:

The case of Standard Oil is already a classic, but it is worth citing again. Standard Oil of Indiana has this record:

Stock outstanding from 1892 to 1912 was worth $1,000,000.

In 1912 came a 2900 per cent stock dividend.

In 1920 came a 150 per cent stock dividend.

In 1921 came a 100 per cent stock dividend.

Thus, without a cent of new investment the original $1,000,000 increased to $150,000,000 through the pyramiding process of profits-to-capital. In addition to stock dividends the cash dividends declared between 1911 and 1924 were $125,248,969. In other words, every $100 invested before 1912 brought back to the investor within twelve years approximately $27,500.

So much for just one industrial corporation. Among distributive corporations the following is a typical example of capitalist accumulation. Kresge's five-and-ten-cent-stores company had 254 stores in 1924 and its sales were $90,096,249. It is not necessary to list the various cash dividends declared. The stock dividends have been:

80 per cent in 1915

54 per cent in 1921

33½ per cent in 1923

50 per cent in 1925

The increase in capitalization from $2,000,000 preferred and $5,000,000 common in 1912 to $2,000,000 preferred and $36,791,899 common in 1925 took place with the addition of almost no new cash investment. In eight and three-quarters years the company has earned dividends of $40,027,181, or 387.97 per cent on the $10,000,000 of common stock outstanding in 1918. (Kresge stock, to the best of our knowledge, is not being distributed widely among the consumers and employees of the stores.)

The Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company in its 12,000 grocery stores has annual sales of $350,000,000, and the profits last year were about $10,500,000, or nearly 800 per cent on the $1,250,000 common stock for the twelve months.

In these and hundreds of similar instances we see vast productive or distributive organizations built up out of the labor of the workers and the needs of the consumers with all the control and all the rewards in the hands of the owners of the capital.

What, then, are the alternatives to capitalism? Dr. Fosdick says he is in favor of the capitalist system because no workable alternative has yet appeared. A surprisingly large number of otherwise rather intelligent folks seem to agree with him; and most of the leaders of organized labor apparently have no quarrel with this point of view.

There is at least one form of economic organization in which the control and the distribution of the rewards are genuinely democratic, and it is an organization that works. The reason that so many Americans cannot see it is that they continue to think the rewards of any worth-while system must be in terms of interest and profits on investment. The test question is not Does it do the job? but Does it pay?

When we talk about deflecting the rewards of industry to the workers we are accustomed to think in terms of the financial gains to be made from industry. When we talk of labor control of business we find ourselves thinking in terms of stock ownership. In brief our first need is for a new thought process with regard to economic affairs; mentally we must learn to subordinate the capital-stock control of a corporation to the more important elements of producers' labor and consumers' needs.

The genuine demand of labor for control in industry should be not for control of industry's profits but for the control of industry itself. Modern capitalist industry is only incidentally interested in production. Thus, capitalist business and the joint-stock corporation are not adapted to true control by either producers or consumers, for they are not designed for service. Real control of industry by these groups demands a new form of economic organization. Hence the futility of this stock-distribution movement.

The most effective alternative to capitalism is the economic form of organization known as Rochdale Cooperation, which does thus subordinate the capital element in industry to the labor and consumer element. There was evolved in England these eighty years ago a type of business institution which pays the minimum market price for capital just as it pays the minimum market price for any other tool, pig iron, coal, or freight cars; and it then devotes its main energies to production or distribution for use. It does, in most cases, issue shares of stock, but these are mere certificates of membership given in exchange for a loan of capital. They have no claim upon surplus or profits and they carry no extraordinary control power to the shareholders. Both control of policy and rights to the profits are vested in the producer or consumer in his capacity of producer or consumer and not in his capacity of investor. American workers have not yet learned to make this distinction.

An illustration. The British Canadian Cooperative Society, an organization of coal miners in Cape Breton, is eighteen years old. Its membership has risen from eighty-eight the first year to 2,767 in 1924. During these eighteen years the society has paid interest on the capital investment of stockholders at the rate of 4, 4½, or 5 per cent (after allotting each year something to the reserve fund); and the balance has been returned as patronage rebates. In 1924, for instance, the gross sales were $1,359,800; net earnings were $169,732.97; interest paid on capital was $12,391.64, and the amount returned to patrons in proportion to purchases was $153,425.33 (a 12 per cent savings-return). The totals for the eighteen years are:

Sales	$9,633,523.00
Net earnings	1,281,888.93
Interest on capital	84,484.31
Patronage rebates	1,167,386.87

Under a capitalist form of organization the investors and the patrons would probably have fared somewhat as follows during, for example, the years 1920 to 1924—after a similar amount had been put each year in the reserve fund:

Year	Dividend if paid on capital Amount	Per cent	Return to patrons
1920	$154,237.97	83	0
1921	176,804.26	68	0
1922	156,933.53	72	0
1924	165,816.97	65	0

Original capital in the beginning was only $1,710. The total return on this investment alone, had capitalist rules been substituted for cooperative, would have been several thousand per cent.

The Indian Orchard and Ludlow Cooperative Association in Massachusetts is another example of the cooperative division of "earnings to those who make earnings possible." It is not necessary to give the figures year by year. For the nineteen years this association has been in business the sales have been $2,058,785.80. Net earnings during the period have been $104,863.48, divided as follows:

Interest on Capital	$7,582.80
Reserves	12,163.28
Return to patrons	85,117.40

Whereas the return to stockholders has been 5 per cent each year, the annual amount returned to purchasers has usually exceeded the paid-in capital!

The point may be equally well illustrated in a producers' cooperative where the cooperators use their association for selling instead of for buying. The Farmers' Equity Cooperative Creamery Association of Orleans, Nebraska, is a simple illustration. Between early 1918 and June 30, 1925, the "profits" have been $186,382. This has been divided as follows:

Cash patronage refund to members.....	$44,000
"Stock dividend" (stock rebated in proportion to patronage)	67,000
Surplus and undivided earnings.....	75,382

The members of this cooperative have never received more than 3 per cent interest on their capital invested in shares of the association—or not more than (approximately) $10,000 during the seven years. The big "profits" went back to the same people in their capacity as producers. Had it been paid on investment, the return would have been somewhere between 400 per cent and 500 per cent.

The same principle holds true in the banking field. A large New York bank like the First National makes for its stockholders profits of 160 per cent from the traffic with the depositors and the borrowers. The cooperative bank, La Caisse Populaire, Quebec, started with a capital of $26 among wage workers, has done a business of more than $11,000,000 in twenty-two years without a single loss from a bad loan, and has never returned more than 6 per cent to the stockholders. The "money dividends" that might have enriched a few owners of the stock have become "service dividends" to the borrowers and depositors.

The liberals and radicals of the country, if they are to contribute to a sensible solution of our economic problems, must incorporate the cooperative principles of organization in their manner of handling the economic problem. For the creation of a democratic and cooperative economic order we do not need to wait for the total collapse of our capitalist system and the chaos which would result. But neither need we expect that in the marriage of modern capitalism and labor unionism is the cooperative commonwealth to be conceived and born. The technique for the control of industry and commerce cooperatively has been established these fourscore years and is gradually undermining and supplanting capitalism in all parts of the world.

We quote Professor Fred Hall, adviser of studies in the Cooperative Union of Great Britain and Ireland: "The cooperative position is that all the requisites of production should be owned by the community . . . so that the workers, as organizers of industry, would receive not merely the share of wealth which now goes to them as wages, but those shares of wealth produced which are now distributed as rent, interest, and profits."

The Secret Sorrow of the White House

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, January 30

THE little Massachusetts clique which hovers about the White House and constitutes the Coolidge inner guard or advisory board or Kitchen Cabinet or whatever you choose to call them has a secret sorrow. The cold, clammy hand of apprehension clutches their hearts these days. It isn't the tax bill or the farm problem or the World Court or the coal strike or railroad consolidation or the immigration question or the Aluminum case or anything of that sort about which they worry. As a matter of fact, I am credibly informed and believe subjects such as these are rarely touched upon between Mr. Coolidge and his New England intimates. For one thing he himself is not greatly interested or concerned about them and is content, as explained at yesterday's correspondents' conference, to take the judgment of Senator Curtis, the majority leader, on such strategic questions as the application of cloture, and of Senators Lenroot, Swanson, and others on World Court reservations, believing that they know best and having no particular convictions on them himself. That is in effect what the presidential spokesman said, although you were not supposed to make that deduction.

For another thing, these large legislative and departmental matters bother and bewilder good old Garibaldi Sargent and are not altogether clear to the devoted Stearns. Politics and appointments, the activities and attitude of the various persons suspected of presidential aspirations, whom next to invite to the White House, who can get the shoe vote in Massachusetts—these are more congenial topics. Besides, there is no use worrying about legislative problems. If you let them alone they will come out all right nine times out of ten anyhow. That is the basis of Calvin's whole political philosophy.

A much more serious matter is the question whether Bosom Friend Butler, Senator from Massachusetts, can be elected next fall. Now, that really is something worth worrying about—at least from the angle of the little White House group. And the thing that gives them most concern is the thing they most want to conceal—to wit, not only the complete absence of record made by the Bosom Friend since he entered the Senate more than a year ago but the absolutely barren prospect that he will do anything between now and next November calculated to win him votes.

The truth is Senator Butler faces a desperate fight. He may win, but his friends and supporters are scared stiff over the prospect, and the White House concern is based on the belief that the Butler defeat will not only be an individual disaster to him but a slap square in the eye for Calvin. Here are the facts: Massachusetts is Mr. Coolidge's own State. Senator Butler is his Bosom Friend, the manager of his campaign for the Presidency, the man he selected for chairman of the National Committee. Further, Senator Butler has but one issue—Mr. Coolidge. The only reason that can be given for returning him to the Senate is that he is Mr. Coolidge's friend, and a defeat for him would be a defeat for the President.

The danger, clearly perceived by the Coolidge group, is that failure of Senator Butler may start the presidential prestige and popularity, concededly a temporary and precarious asset, on the down grade. It would certainly be interpreted as a repudiation of Mr. Coolidge by the people of his own State, just as surely as the 1918 congressional elections were a repudiation of Wilson in the country. There could be no other interpretation. No wonder the little Coolidge group is worried. No wonder they deplore the inability of the Bosom Friend to help himself. No wonder they wish he did not have to lean so heavily and wholly on the President and that he did not have against him such a whirlwind, hard-hitting opponent as Dave Walsh.

The fact is that the good Butler is what might be termed a net loss as a campaigner. He is, of course, a man of integrity and character. He has all the small virtues, but he is about as jolly and genial and festive as an owl. A colder, frostier proposition in politics cannot now be recalled. Unquestionably he is an efficient business man, but when you say that you have said 90 per cent of what there is to say of Senator Butler. Neither as chairman of the National Committee nor as Senator has he distinguished himself. The seven million majority was due not in the least to him but to the Democrats, to La Follette, to the irresistible, unprecedented, unparalleled prosperity. One could not conceive of a man less well fitted to make an uphill fight with the odds against him and the money and weight on the other side. In the Senate it was supposed that the power of his position as head of the committee, plus an exclusive closeness to Mr. Coolidge would establish him as a real factor. It has done nothing of the sort. He has no influence in the Senate, no following, and has made no particular friends. He does not pass on the presidential orders or instructions from the President. For one reason, there are no such orders or instructions, and for another Republican Senators would not take them from Butler if there were. He has, since he has been in the Senate, made but one speech I can now recall and that was in defense of Warren, the jolly old beet-sugar king who came so close to being Attorney General. Everyone who heard the speech agreed it was zero in effectiveness and almost zero in substance. But after all it is not to be held against Mr. Butler that he is neither eloquent, brilliant, nor cordial in his manner. Lots of men and some Senators are like that. Yet people like them, and they are of use in legislation and politics.

The trait that distinguishes Butler from other wealthy business men who, in one way or another, have broken into the Senate and are making regular, unobtrusive, mediocre, and utterly unexciting machine members of that body is the stiff and narrow intolerance of his mind and the smug but unshakable conviction that all the righteous and patriotic people in the country are organization, high-tariff Republicans and that there is necessarily something low and degraded in those who are outside of that class. He is one of the most rigid and complete partisans there is in the Senate today. Those who know him best say he does not want to stay and that the waste of time, the lack of business methods, rasps him very much. If money and organization and federal patronage and the appeal to stand by and "uphold the hands of our splendid President," as the pious Pepper so often and so earnestly says, can pull him through he will win; because he has all those things. But if they are not enough, he will certainly lose—because he hasn't anything else—not a thing. And that is the secret sorrow of the inner White House circle.

"DRIFTY, my boy," writes a friend who still recalls a period of service at 20 Vesey Street and is accordingly impudent, "you are too provincial. You ought to come out to China. Those remarks of yours about the awkward, not, constricting, and bulky clothing of the male, and your incidental references to the 'more decorative and sensible sex'—apparently referring to the female of the species Homo Americanus—betray a limited perspective. Your assumption that stiff hats and stiff collars, long trousers and hot coats are secondary sex characters because the benighted males of New York and London cling to them is as provincial as the disgust of the tourists who wander about Hangchow hungry because they can't find good American bread and milk or chop suey.

* * * * *

"COME out to this country of sartorial freedom, where the men wear skirts and the women trousers—or vice versa if they like. Take a look at a group of rickshaw boys and try to find constriction, heat, or bulk, or any principle of fashion expressed among them. Invite your lady friend who suspects men of fearing to expose their legs to look at these sturdy coolie shins—and bare brown coolie chests as well. Consider the individuality expressed in a coolie coat patched (quite literally) in seventeen different shades of blue. Note their trousers—some tied at the ankle, some tied at the knee, others cut off at any convenient length. Or watch the dignified gentry parading the street, with flowered silk trousers concealed beneath priestly robes, long and all-enveloping as a 1900 skirt. You will see sour-colored felt hats here, too, but also impressive skull-caps reminiscent of freshman days on the campus, and untrammelled by any hats at all the wind blows through a more fantastic variety of hair-cuts than decent Americans would think of tolerating—from brush cuts through grizzly forests of hair to coiled queues.

* * * * *

"AS for the ladies—if you are still incurably romantic, go to Japan. There the ladies really decorate the landscape—and can have little time left to do anything else. No statistician has yet computed the hours spent in rolling a Japanese obi about a shapely waist, or the ratio of cloth in a kimono to that in a 1925-length Western skirt. But as to the effect—if beauty determines, you will stay in the Orient and let the Western styles fade out of your unfortunate memory. Chinese women, to be sure, are more practical—most of them seem to wear whatever they happen to find lying about the house. Their baggy trousers would give pointers to a Princeton undergraduate; and Western pyjama designers would do well to study a batch of Chinese factory girls. And when the ultra-modern Chinese miss decides upon a skirt she refuses Western models and invents her own, which a mere man would hardly dare describe. In this year of grace her silk-slipped toe barely peeks from beneath the sweeping base-line.

* * * * *

"SHOES are another item in the catalogue of Oriental freedom. Those peekaboo feminine shoes now advertised in the home papers are obviously patterned after coolie footgear, which consist of a straw base bound to the foot by miscellaneous strings. Soft slippers are infinitely more graceful than the hard-heeled abominations of the West, and silk offers fairer possibilities than leather to the artist. And a Japanese shoe store full of painted and lacquered geta is a joy to the eye. Come out to the East, Drifter; forget the prison fashions of the West. You have been sitting still too long."

THE DRIFTER agrees it is high time that he be set drifting again. Unfortunately, the weather is too cold.

Crime and Capital Punishment

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of December 2 Judge Frederick Bausman attempts to uphold the institution of capital punishment in the United States on the ground that the application of this penalty in Great Britain has resulted in a substantial decrease of capital crimes. The chances of being hanged for a capital offense in this country, he tells us, "are very small." Were more "wilful persons" who "murder to get money" hanged, such crimes would soon be as infrequent here as in Northern Europe. Hence he favors not only retention of capital punishment in our codes but also its stricter application.

Now, it seems to me that Judge Bausman has here given a very strong argument in favor of legal abolition of capital punishment in this country. He admits that, as a matter of fact, only one out of 180 persons accused of murder in Cook County, Illinois, was actually hanged. Of what use, then, is this penalty, if convictions under its provision cannot be secured? American jurors are reluctant to bring in a verdict of guilty when the penalty to be inflicted is death. They are afraid of making a mistake—of condemning to death an innocent victim of the police force.

My records show that this fear is well founded. Such mistakes have occurred—just how many no one knows. If Judge Bausman will turn to Vol. XLIII, No. 3 (May-June, 1909) of the American Law Review, he will find that the first article deals with the question Does Capital Punishment Prevent Convictions? In answering this question in the affirmative, I presented ample evidence to prove conclusively that the menace of the death penalty tends more to protect the accused prisoner through intimidation of the jury than to protect society through its supposed deterrent effect upon would-be assassins. Subsequent research and observation have more than confirmed my views of 1909.

MAYNARD SHIPLEY

Ruff Enough

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am a dirt farmer, in the wheat belt; find time to read a weekly during two of the winter months. In the issue of December 23 The Nation has two editorials and one article on taxation. When taxes are mentioned a farmer is all attention; he has a naked nerve that has been touched by a scalpel. In your federal-tax editorial the farmer is mentioned several times—something rare even in high-brow journalism. So, should an archaeologist two thousand years hence delve diligently among the remains, he probably would discover that in our time there was not altogether missing such a class as farmers.

The editorial entitled The Menace of Education discusses higher education, which of course is maintained by State taxes. Mr. Hind is right. We are merely running hobo factories with our present methods of higher education; the output is either hobos or 100 per centers.

Why should a farmer, whose sense of independence, individuality, self-reliance, and self-respect has long ago been destroyed by the war to make the world safe for democracy, by the war to end war, be compelled to work sixteen hours a day, sixteen hours of unremunerative and strength-exhausting hard labor, in order to gain a bare, precarious, and barbarous existence for the primary purpose of keeping hobo factories running? Oh, I enjoyed the keen and cutting satire in all three articles; in fact, I rolled to the floor of my cabin convulsed by laughter. But—

My State and county taxes are something like $1,100 per year. By far the largest item is education. I am, like other farmers, unable to pay such a senseless tax. Often our entire gross farm receipts do not amount to the sum of these taxes. Now, where is a dirt farmer ever appointed to any board of regents, or any other managerial or administrative office? Why is this? Why should he slave for what are to him parasitical institutions? Perhaps our law-and-order apostles have him hogtied. Talk about bolshevism in Russia—its confiscation of property—is nauseous. It is the camouflage of our smirky and cowardly Republican and Democratic party politicians while they are confiscating our property with vengeance, confiscation of homes via taxation. It is this higher education that doesn't educate, our economic blockade otherwise known as the Fordney tariff schedules, and the embargo on immigration that have paralyzed the farmer.

When the farmer's sons reach puberty they are off to the cities where larger wages are paid, not for sixteen hours' work but eight hours'. They need not be like their father, hopelessly in debt; they can lay by considerable sums and have time for reading or other recreation. This reduces the help on the farm to the old men and their wives and small children and culls not wanted in the cities to carry on the despairing struggle to retain their homes.

FRANK HINKHOUSE

War Atrocities

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Has any historian attempted a full collection of the atrocity stories sent out by the propaganda bureaus during the late war? It seems to me that a judicious selection of these horrific yarns' would have permanent value.

My attention has been directed to this question by reading of the effects of one such story upon members of the Cabinet in the critical days just before the United States entered the war. It appears in the letters of Franklin K. Lane (page 239) in a letter to his brother on February 25, 1917:

Washington, February 25, 1917

My dear George: On Friday we had one of the most animated sessions of the Cabinet that I suppose has ever been held under this or any other President. It all arose out of a very innocent question of mine as to whether it was true that the wives of American consuls on leaving Germany had been stripped naked, given an acid bath to detect writing on their flesh, and subjected to other indignities. Lansing answered that it was true. Then I asked Houston about the bread riots in New York, as to whether there was shortage of food because of car shortage due to vessels not going out with exports. This led to a discussion of the great problem which we all had been afraid to raise. Why shouldn't we send our ships out with guns or convoys? Daniels said we must not convoy—that would be dangerous. (Think of a Secretary of the Navy talking of danger!) The President said that the country was not willing that we should take any risks of war. I said that I got no such sentiment out of the country, but if the country knew that our consuls' wives had been treated so outrageously that there would be no question as to the sentiment. This, the President took as a suggestion that we should work up a propaganda of hatred against Germany. Of course, I said I had no such idea, but that I felt that in a democracy the people were entitled to know the facts. McAdoo, Houston, and Redfield joined me. The President turned on them bitterly, especially on McAdoo, and reproached all of us with appealing to the spirit of the Code Duello. We couldn't get the idea out of his head that we were bent on pushing the country into war. Houston talked of resigning after the meeting. McAdoo will—within a year, I believe. I tried to smooth them down by recalling our past experiences with the President. We have had to push, and push, and push, to get him to take any forward step—the Trade Commission, the Tariff Commission. He comes out right but he is slower than a glacier—and things are mighty disagreeable whenever anything has to be done.

The above letter is interesting for several reasons. It appears to negative the opinion, popular in some circles, that Mr. Wilson had desired war long before the opportunity came to make his feelings public. The story also gives a new view as to what our Cabinet really went to war about! If the acid-bath story was as baseless as one is inclined to suppose in the light of our present knowledge of war propaganda, it ought to make a valuable footnote in the story of the war propaganda and of the incredible naivete of our own public officials.

"The Only Pure Race"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his letter in The Nation of January 20 Mr. Godkin makes the claim that the Jews are "the only pure race." This is an error. In his book, "The Races of Europe," Professor Ripley has shown that in the ninth century Jewish traders converted whole Slavic tribes in southern Russia to their faith. The great numbers of Jews in Russia and Poland are due to these conversions. If there are any pure Jews they live in Algeria and Tripoli. With their regular features, their oval faces, olive complexion, black hair, and black eyes they recall the ancient Jews. In Europe there are no pure races, not even in Scandinavia, where the "Nordics" are said to have come from.

That there is an anti-Jewish spirit in America cannot be denied. Whenever a racial group in any country refuses to mix with the whole mass of people it acts as a foreign body in the social organisms and causes irritation. The Jews may consider it wrong freely to intermarry with other creeds, but as long as they do so they will arouse enmity. In the light of modern thought and ideals this is wrong, but it is a reality.

Important if True

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR:

All hail, great Champion! Every righteous Cause has found you eager to accept the gage flung by the Joustors of a cynic Age, and ever alert to pierce their armor's flaws!

You have upheld the Tournament's just Laws, have dared the adversaries' insulting rage.
O incorruptible, calm, shrewd, and sage:
for you now rings the World's deep-voiced applause!

All hail, staunch Champion of the Truth, the Right!
Defender of Liberty and Justice, hail!
Keep on unwearied in the gallant fight!

Let not your courage or your vigilance fail!
In spite of vicious blows your shield is bright—bright as the dazzling symbol of the Grail!

Intrigue in the Middle East

By ALBIN E. JOHNSON

PARADOXICALLY, the very "ideal" which caused Syria to revolt, the force that raised the standard of Abd-el-Krim across North Africa, that almost brought the British to grief in Egypt (and may yet do so), that aided Kemal to rally his disorganized Turks when all seemed lost, and that spattered village streets in India with blood not long ago, namely, Woodrow Wilson's enunciation of the urge for self-determination and equality, has temporarily thwarted the nationalistic aspirations of various Moslem peoples. Had the uprisings been localized or had they occurred at different times in the different European zones of influence, the diplomatic forces of the exploiting Powers might not have been united. The almost simultaneous disturbances—from the Riff to Mesopotamia—confronted Europe with a smoldering Islam which recalled the Crusades. France, England, Italy—never sympathetic to one another's imperial aspirations—realized that loss of prestige to any one of them meant a gain in morale to the enemy of all three. A Turkish victory in Mosul would have brought joy to malcontents in India; gains by the Egyptian Zaghlulists heartened the hard-pressed Riffians and the battered Syrians, while Ibn Sa'ud's triumphs in Mecca, Medina, and Jeddah reechoed in prayers from mosques and minarets all over the East. Ordinarily as disunited as the countries of Europe in pre-war days, the tribes of the desert and dwellers in the Jebel also are beginning to realize that in union there is strength and that their common exploiter is the European. European chancelleries know the same thing—and that is why the odds against Syria are overwhelming and the Arabs—for the moment—simply have to lose.

Briefly recapitulated, the history of Syria shows French influence began about 1860, when as a result of the massacre of some 6,000 Christians the French occupied Damascus and assumed the responsibility of "protector of the Church." A year later Lebanon was placed under the control of six European Powers with a Christian governor. From that time until the Great War priority of French interests was generally recognized.

In 1915, anxious to use the tribesmen against the Turks, the Allies nurtured Arab nationalism and made agreements with Sherif Hussein of Mecca and a commission representing the Arabs of Damascus, Aleppo, and Mosul. Invaluable service was rendered to the Allied cause and Turkey's defeat was due largely to the campaigning of the Hejaz tribesmen. And, ironically, as a result the almost primitive community of Hejaz secured its independence, while the far more advanced and civilized Arabs of Syria, Palestine, and Lebanon have had their nationalistic aspirations bloodily suppressed. In fact, Syria today enjoys a smaller measure of self-government than it did under Turkish sovereignty.

In 1918 Britain and France jointly made a declaration assuring the Arabs that they had no intention of subjugating them, but rather would liberate them from the Turkish yoke and "help them establish national administrations which shall derive their authority from the invitation and free will of the people themselves." Then, in order to reconcile their recognition of Arab self-determination with opportunist and imperialistic policies, "all the diplomatic ingenuity of foreign offices was brought into play," in secret treaties between the British and French, and subsequently in the difficult drafting of "A" Mandates. Theoretically, the League became responsible for the supervising of the execution of these mandatory trusts. Actually, the territories were placed under British and French tutelage for an unspecified time and subject to powers as ample as if the zones in question were literally colonies or protectorates.

Stamping out the Druse rebellion in Syria was not a difficult thing, once the French had determined upon a line of action and overcome internal differences. The bombardment of Damascus marked the turn against the rebels. But stifling the nationalistic aspirations of the Arabs is another thing. To assure permanent penetration, economically and otherwise, the malcontents either had to be brought into line or eliminated. To the Powers in Syria this task was intrusted; to spokesmen at Geneva fell the task of squaring policies with the League and ex-Allied Powers.

At the December session of the League Council—and the meeting of the Permanent Mandate Commission just preceding it—several interesting things occurred, of no obvious significance to casual observers, but important to those who can lift the veil and look behind the scenes.

Britain and Turkey were facing conclusions over Mosul. France was on the grill of public opinion because of alleged irregularities in Syria. Italy, whose troops had just wiped out a native village in Somaliland in retaliation for the death of two soldiers, was determined in the words of Benito Mussolini to "widen its penetration and extend its power . . . by virile conduct, combative if need be," and stood on the fence ready for any deals.

For more than a year Turkey, presumably single handed, had refused Britain's demands for additional potential oil territory in Mosul. Back of her had stood France, using, in accordance with Franklin-Boullion's agreement with Angora, all the diplomatic pressure at her disposal to defeat England's claims. With a deadlock in the Council's sub-committee and France's friendly support, Turkey's chances of success were good. But down in the Jebel Druse country things were happening. The anti-French revolt had assumed serious proportions. Tribes throughout the Lebanon were rebelling. French losses had exceeded 7,000 dead and missing. Damascus fell, was bombarded, and recaptured. An official envoy of the Syrians appeared in Angora. He sought arms and unofficial aid. Every minister except Mustapha Kemal was approached, and from all he received information of the Franco-Turk pledge: For aid in Mosul Turkey had promised neutrality as to Syria. Turkey, aping the diplomats of Europe, was trying to play both ends against the middle, little realizing, however, that color, geography, and religion made her role impossible.

So the Syrian repaired to Geneva, where for France things had taken on an alarming aspect. From various sources came protests and charges regarding the French administration of the mandate. Neutral members of the League looked askance; Arab organizations in Egypt, Transjordan, Mesopotamia, and Palestine, as well as the Syrians themselves, demanded an impartial investigation. Even Paris, tacitly admitting that all was not well, sacrificed General Sarraill on the pyres of her own public opinion.

Henry de Jouvenel, exponent of the Mandate System, and in good standing in League Circles, was designated as new high commissioner. Theoretically he was given carte blanche to undo Sarraill's alleged errors and to seek temporarily at least to placate the rebellious tribesmen. M. Paul-Boncour came to Geneva. M. de Jouvenel went to London.

To cope successfully with the situation it was necessary to reach an understanding with the British. The rebel territory reached to the Palestine boundary. Cairo, a hotbed of intrigue, was but twelve hours away. So in London de Jouvenel did the unheard-of thing—he outlined France's policy toward Syria. "The time has come," he said, "when countries having contiguous interests in the Middle East can no longer act without informing one another of their policies."

A fortnight later—at Geneva—Mosul was awarded to Britain. Bewildered, the Turkish Foreign Minister, Tewfik Rushdy Bey, made two separate trips to Paris within three days. Strangely enough, he failed to see M. Briand. But he saw M. Chicherin—and took back to Angora instead of the Mosul the double-edged alliance with Turkey's age-old enemy, Russia.

Britain got Mosul! What did France get . . . and Italy?

During the fortnight the Council was in session Ihsan el Djabri Bey, spokesman of the Syrians, hammered at the portals of the League. Armed with damning documents he sought to present them to the Council; to demand an immediate investigation into affairs in the mandated zone. Citing atrocity after atrocity—by Senegalese, Circassian, and Algerian troops—and backing his charges with figures, names, dates, and places, he gained the ear of M. Scialoja, Italian, president of the Council.

"Wait and see!" was Scialoja's only comment to the appeal for action. M. Ishii, taciturn delegate of Japan, listened politely. What he said to Ihsan el Djabri remains confidential. Japan is not interested in the Middle East—but the Orient. Sir Eric Drummond volunteered that there was a recognized method of procedure, through the Permanent Mandates Commission. Marquis Theodoli, president of the Mandates Commission, was in Geneva. But his suggestion was come to Rome—in February. Until then France had a free hand in Syria, with instructions to maintain order. Balked at every turn, the Syrian appealed in vain. The door of the League, "protector of mandates," was closed.

Under the instructions of the League, France's duties as a mandatory Power are, as stated above, to "maintain order." She also is instructed to frame an "organic law" for Syria before September 29, 1926. When the commission met in October to hear her report—after three years—Paris was not ready. Emir Chekibe Arslan, envoy of the Syrians and Palestine, then demanded an investigation. The commission decided to postpone hearing France's case until February, in Rome.

The Emir protested, first against the delay and second against a meeting in Rome. The fight against postponement received no consideration. The opposition to a hearing in Rome did. According to the minutes, just made available, Sir Francis Lugard, Briton, insisted that "doubts had been expressed as to the advisability of discussing Syrian affairs in the center of the Catholic world." M. Rappard, Swiss, urged that the commission, "like Caesar's wife, should be above suspicion." The chairman, a Roman, and the rest of the commission overruled them. The Council, then in session in Paris on the Greek-Bulgar affair, upheld the decision.

That the atmosphere of Rome in any way affect the results of the Syrian hearing is doubtful. The wheels of diplomacy run just as smoothly in all continental quarters. But, nevertheless, it is significant that two members of the commission, one a British delegate, should have voiced disapproval. Furthermore, Italy has interests in North Africa. Her dream of empire might be said to include at least a corridor from Algiers to Somaliland. Even Smyrna is mentioned as a desideratum. Besides, the Moslems of Ras Hafoun must not be allowed to lose respect for European prestige.

Events move slowly in the Middle East. Might still makes right—consequently order will be restored in Syria. The League's Mandate Commission will hear in February that the dove of peace is flying over Damascus and out in the deserts and in the Jebel ranges bands of guerrillas will keep the embers of nationalism burning.

NOTE.—In Arabia, after the war, Britain placed Hussein on the throne. His sons, Abdullah and Feisal, were respectively made rulers over Transjordan and Mesopotamia. Simultaneously, the Colonial Office and the Foreign Office were supporting both Hussein and Ibn Sa'ud, chief of the Wahabis. Hussein has fallen, Ibn Sa'ud is in control of Arabia. The Morning Post, December 1, 1925, reported that Sir Gilbert Clayton has concluded a treaty with Ibn Sa'ud whereby Britain is to recognize him and contribute $1,000,000 a year to support his army. Hussein and his son Ali, who succeeded him, pass into discard.

MARY GLENN

by SARAH G. MILLIN

Author of

GOD'S STEPCHILDREN

"THE most vivid picture of South African life which she has yet given. It is further a significant and provocative stimulus to the question of current standards. The distance Mrs. Millin has covered between her first novel, 'THE DARK RIVER,' and 'MARY GLENN' is alone indicative of a noble and responsible talent. She has attained to compassion without softening to sentiment; she has acquired assurance of judgment without becoming clever, she is simple without resorting to formula. She is one of the notable writers of this generation." N. Y. Times. Second Edition. $2.00

Thoughts at the Year's End

By BABETTE DEUTSCH

Draw a clean breath of crisp and moonless air;
Fix eyes upon the dark;
set ears to catch the knocking of the wind along the ground, whereto no grass replies, being numb as wire.
The traveling clock you carry everywhere about with you, the jewel of your bones, ticks with too little sound, keeping the time no other soul may share, making you know
here's night, here's winter, here's year's end to bear once more,
and without a god's help, now, without a devil, and without desire.

O happy Egypt! O most eloquent stones, heaped like a hill of thunder, frescoed in gold and black and rusted vermillion, to comfort a god, the son of the Sun, with riches.
O wise embalmers' bandages tightly wound, to keep the dignity of the Pharaoh's bones unbitten by any tooth, save, it may be, the envy of a slave.
O black marble nostrils, spread like wings, squat dark doorways
open to eternal life.
We come upon you, fifty centuries having passed,
we, the sorrowful heirs and assigns of your grave-treasure, your bread, your heart, your rings, buried with you—
we remember, O son of the Sun, that even the first Father, shining on the Moskva as on the Rhein, the Seine as on the Thames, the Hudson
as on old Nile—
even the Sun is doomed, and dooms us in a little while.

In His eyes
two thousand years are as a moment.
Now at the winter solstice, when the light is squeezed like a drop of watery chrome on the faded earth, to be lapped up by a brumous blotter of darkness, does He remember the long December night through which the chosen virgin labored to bring peace to the people?
(Sing: holy, holy, holy,
Lord God almighty!)
He endured much—the kiss of betrayal, the heavy way up the hard hill,

the ropes, the nails, the spear,
the death agony, the slow, long rending, most the mockery
He cast upon Himself when He cried out,
"Elohai, Elohai, lama sabachthani?"
That moment is over.
And we, who have seen His peace shredded by Huns and Romans, priests and kings, rich men and rabble,
we whom He could not save (Himself He could not save) now watch the wintry dark as a sick seaman watches his coldly tossing grave.

But who are we
that we should envy the Pharaoh, the Keeper of the House, who built his house forever, or that we should rate the God of the Hebrews, One and Eternal, because He turned into a Trinity, and, soon thereafter, ceased?

We are so small the fleas that crawled over behemoth bulked larger to that huge pasture than we to the stars, and to the night the blinking stars are less than fireflies to the whole wilderness.
O vanity of man! that would spin Cosmos out of a small gray clot locked in a fragile shell.
Say: God is not.
Say: man dies,
every man, alone (bite on this iron at midnight, when you lie sleepless, in bed, with half a life gone by, eaten away—the day will be undone,
love and ambition be ashy on your tongue, and oblivion will roll its weight over upon you, ton and giant ton).
Say: God is not, death's instant, history's a fever the moon died of—what way now?
There's no help in the hills, for they will crumble, nor in the skies, for earth is a dropped stitch in their pattern
(but even to fumble, there must be Fingers, and for a pattern—Mind) . . .

Reach out, reach out, you will touch nothing, you will find nothing, but yet reach,

with the balked pressure of the blind on emptiness, reach, grope, seize, shape.
Or, let the ice-blue winding-sheet that waits for earth swaddle your infant wisdom at the birth.

or, from the cracked bones of despair suck marrow, and bend Now backward and forward in your spirit's heat.
And bear . . . and bear . . .

From more than three thousand poems submitted in The Nation's annual poetry contest the editors have chosen "Thoughts at the Year's End," by Babette Deutsch, to receive the first prize of $100. But they were so much pleased by Leonora Speyer's "Ballad of Old Doc Higgins," which follows next week, that they have decided to award it a second prize of $50. They wish also to give honorable mention to John Gould Fletcher, Genevieve Taggard, and Laurence Jordan.

Aldous Huxley*

By EDWIN MUIR

IT is about five years since Mr. Huxley first became known to the public. A small volume of verse, "The Defeat of Youth," had appeared before that, but it did not arouse much attention. "Limbo" did; and since its appearance Mr. Huxley has written eight books, comprising novels, short stories, a poem, and two volumes of essays. Productiveness such as this is unusual, but as remarkable as Mr. Huxley's industry has been his popularity. Most of his books have run into a third impression; even his essays and his poems have been read. No other writer of our time has built up a serious reputation so rapidly and so surely; compared with his rise to acceptance that of Mr. Lawrence or Mr. Eliot has been gradual, almost painful. Mr. Huxley's public capitulated almost at the first stroke of his pen, and they have been docile ever since. They have found in his work less a point of view than an affinity; they are as delighted with what he says as if a part of themselves, a part of themselves weary of humbug and the burdens it imposes, were saying it. To all those in difficulties, to everybody, in short, a profound sense of relief is given if they are told at the right moment that what they take to be their soul is in reality their liver. The relief is great because the problem is at once simplified and its dimensions sensibly reduced. Mr. Huxley has been telling us in a variety of ways that it is our liver. It is a hit-or-miss diagnosis, as true, perhaps, as M. Coué's, but as one-sided, and essentially of the same order. It is also a peculiarly English kind of truth, for nowhere are prejudices and crotchets more really respected than in England.

But of the many writers who are saying that it is our liver no one says it so gracefully, so passionately, almost so entrancingly, as Mr. Huxley. Other writers of his generation, indeed most of them, have been disposed to reduce emotions, ideals, sentimentalities to their elements, but no one else has done it so effectively and so amusingly. Mr. Huxley is so effective partly because he has the power of disengaging his mind as if it were an impersonal instrument and letting it operate a little diabolically for its own purposes; but partly because that mind is never too complex for the immediate task, the pricking of an illusion. It does what it sets out to do; it desires to do no more; it is extraordinarily effective and completely without nuance. The style which is its instrument is agreeable, lively, continuously graceful, but it seldom attempts anything that would be likely to strain its powers. Effectiveness, then,

Mr. Huxley has in a striking degree. He has a complete grasp of ways and means; he is seldom in difficulties; he excels with ease in every form he sets his hand to. But all this, one feels, is achieved at the expense of something complex, immediate, and essential, for which he does not seem to have striven. His style is supple, natural, felicitous, but he has never expressed in it a profound truth, nor described with it a living character. And if it be asked why he should have done so, the reply is that he has written novels, and in them has been perpetually obsessed by certain types and by the philosophical problems their lives present. He has called forth these types and these problems; he has written a great deal about them; but he has never really dealt with them.

He has not done so because beneath all his freedom, his engaging licentiousness, of intellect, there persists a certain conventionality, a certain banality. In "Those Barren Leaves" he presents the figure of a meretricious, unhappy, middle-aged woman who thinks she is in love with a young poet. For the imagination a figure such as this held endless possibilities, and Mr. Huxley had the opportunity of exploiting them and of revealing Mrs. Aldwinkle's soul. This, however, he never attempted. He portrays Mrs. Aldwinkle simply as a nuisance; the reaction of his imagination to her, in short, is the same as the reaction of one of her own set might be. And as he deals with Mrs. Aldwinkle he deals with almost all his characters. His art is not one of comprehension; it is one of exposure. He is content—and it is a sign of a certain naivete of mind—if he succeeds in stripping the make-believe from people. In "Antic Hay" Gumbriel, Lypiatt, Mercaptan, the egregious Rosie are all stripped of their hypocrisies; but we are given no inkling of the sources from which these hypocrisies spring. Mr. Huxley dislikes them with a fury which might be that of a moralist, but is not; but the obvious truth is that he has not tried to understand them. For him they might be completely arbitrary, and spring from no cause more particular than the general turpitude of the human race. Because people are one thing and appear another, as they have always done and for their self-preservation must always do, he is enraged. But the objects of his indignation are nothing less than the laws of adaptation, the conditions of civilized existence, the attributes of human nature. All this makes Mr. Huxley as a novelist, as a portrayer of actual men and women, extraordinarily limited; but it makes him as a satirist sometimes very penetrating. Not seeing complexities he cannot be deceived by them; and he maintains therefore through thick and thin, through

Yet often one is puzzled to tell why he does so. It is not because he is openly on the side of virtue, nor is it because he is fascinated, as Baudelaire was, by evil. He has the moral rage, without the morality, of a satirist; and although the effect is unintentional, sometimes he gives the impression of sitting on the fence, of a little irresolutely trying to make the worst of both worlds. We see him pursuing the perfectly worthless but also perfectly inoffensive Rosie through "Antic Hay" with an inexplicable hostility in which there is a complete lack of moral purpose. Why should he do so? Obviously it is because his satire is not a criticism of hypocrisy but a reaction to it. He does not set out to show hypocrisy in its essence and to trace its results, as he would be bound to do if he saw it objectively; he simply sets it down as an object of his dislike. He reacts to it in his characters; he reacts to it, also, in himself. This is a kind of honesty which is rare; but it is one which at the same time is in tune with this age and representative of it. It is not essentially discerning; it is content to convict us of the venial sins and to take a certain pleasure in thus humiliating us. It is an honesty to certain immediate reactions each of which is apprehended in a desert of banality, in the perfect waste left by the disappearance of conceptions, ideals, orders, which were accepted by other ages. It is so faithful to the immediate reactions that it does not permit one to seek for their causes. And so, if there is no philosophy, no attempt to account for the world in general, in Mr. Huxley's books, neither is there any psychology. And, curiously enough, it is this that makes him such a perfect representative of one current of feeling of the age. For the crash of an order which was preparing before the war, and which the war precipitated, does seem to have left a generation who in their universal uncertainty doubt even such terms as the world and the mind, are skeptical of any conclusions which may be drawn from the existence of these things, and are prepared to accept only the sensations they feel and the deceptions practiced by everybody to conceal them. No contemporary writer has portrayed these sensations and seen through these deceptions more clearly than Mr. Huxley. He fills the scene completely, and what is as essential, he does no more than fill it. There could not be, in short, a more perfect example of the writer of transition.

To be so completely of the period, to say unerringly what nine out of ten literate people wish to be said, finally to say it gracefully and wittily—this is in a sense its own reward, this is at the same time to be of service to one's generation if not to posterity. The writer who can do it must have talents of a high order; but he must also have definite limitations, must share as much in the blindness as in the knowledge of his time. He must see just what his contemporaries see—see it with no less knowledge, but also with no more profundity. He must never lift a veil; from appearance he must rather present everything in such a way that it has merely to be recognized. He must share without afterthought the taste of the age; he must be as transitory, as one-sided, as limited, as blind as it. He must be all this, for this is the penalty exacted in exchange for the glance of immediate recognition, of instinctive sympathy, which his work provokes. And if we take almost any scene from Mr. Huxley's novels we can see how exactly these requirements are fulfilled, how completely these limitations are observed. His presentation of the histrionic Lypiatt, the unsuccessful artist who has to talk loud to deceive himself, is a fair example of Mr. Huxley's methods, and how telling it is, but how perfectly on the surface, how crude even! The essential point in the passage is that Lypiatt is not for a moment understood; if he were, another kind of satire would be necessary to do justice to him. He is not a human being with innumerable interests, with many masks, and with a past to explain them. He is rather one set of interests only, one mask only, which has no existence before and after his appearance in the book. His life begins at forty and continues for a few weeks; apart from these he is a perfect blank, an inexplicable void. We are given in Mr. Huxley's stories a succession of impressions of people we have never met before, with whom we never become intimate, and who are never explained. Their author tears their masks from them, but there is nothing beneath. The prolonged scrutiny which would discern complexity in these figures and would thus humanize them—Mr. Huxley never casts it in their direction. He is completely in the present, and he finds it exciting, exasperating, amusing. The humors, the lusts, the hypocrisies, the snobberies—he discovers them all there, and he portrays them. But they remain disembodied. They are not qualities belonging to specific characters and colored by that fact; they are general attributes of human nature.

All this makes Mr. Huxley as a novelist a very unsatisfying, almost an incongruous figure. We feel there is no necessity why he should have chosen the novel rather than another form for what he has to say. It provides him with a loose frame for his intellectual fantasies; in that frame his ideas are more piquant, perhaps, than they would be without it. But it is an improvisation, not a form; it has a utilitarian but not an aesthetic reason for existing. And in choosing it Mr. Huxley has certainly lost more than he has gained. For the fantastic little essays and dialogues—"the delicious little middles"—for which his stories are chiefly read lose a great deal by being put in the mouths of people whom we find shoddy, ill-made, second-rate, and in any case much less interesting than their author himself, who is in reality speaking. Mr. Huxley's work consists essentially in a running argument, sometimes ingenuous, sometimes ironical, with himself. But he interposes between us and this interesting dispute his Gumbriels, Lypiatts, Mercaptans, and worse; and they are tiresome; they stand between us and the theme, they make the author's utterance one degree more false. Unfortunately there is no getting over the bad effects of an error of this kind. Mistakes in the choice of form are fatal; they spring either from a lack of artistic conscience or from a debility of imagination; and in either case the writer, unable to see how things will work out, is inevitably driven to mere improvisation. Mr. Huxley has intelligence, fancy, and wit, but little imagination; and he has chosen the prose form in which imagination is most indispensable. When he resigns it for the purely fantastic, the purely intellectual, as in the short story of the dwarf in "Chrome Yellow," we feel immediately that his talents are heightened and that his work becomes original and serious. For in that story his intellectual fancy is not a delightful irrelevance, as it is in his novels; it is an animating principle. There he found a form which suited his gifts. He has found it once; he may yet achieve something large in it. As it is, it outweighs everything else he has written, and is the best criticism that exists of the remainder of his work.

They Wanted to Tell*

By FLOYD DELL

A FEATURE of American life which has impressed me more, I think, than any other, and which has certainly had something to do with my career as a writer, is one of which American fiction scarcely gives any indication. Novels sometimes deal with the lives of those sensitive young people who ultimately either succeed or fail in expressing themselves in an art; and such novels almost invariably represent these young lives as being spent in endless and exasperating conflict with the huge alien forces of industrialism or conventionality; these young artists are always shown as terribly lonely, and utterly unguided or misguided—and the stultification, partial or complete, which usually overtakes them is blamed, perhaps rightly enough, on that environment. This I have noted as characteristic not only of such fiction but of a good deal of contemporary criticism. I have wondered about it. This unhappy state of affairs may, as a matter of fact, be generally true; I can only testify that I have not found it so.

Taking myself as one of those sensitive young people who were destined ultimately to succeed or fail in an art, I seem to have always been recognized as such a person. No ruthless endeavors were made to fit me as a square peg into a round hole; and my youthful efforts, on the score of making a living, to fit my angularity into various round holes, while arousing some incidental astonishment and impatience by their ineptitude, met also with far more tolerance than anyone would ever guess from reading the novels and criticisms of which I have spoken. It seems to me, though I confess I did not think so at the time, that my various employers displayed upon the whole a Christlike patience toward my youthful clumsiness, absent-mindedness, and general incompetence. Eventually they fired me, to be sure; but I can hardly regret that I was not afforded more encouragement to become a harness-maker, a candy-maker, or an elevator-boy, to name only a few of the heights to which I might have climbed if my employers' patience had held out long enough.

In a sense it was made inevitable that I should become a writer by my gradual expulsion at an early age from most of the other available ways of making a living. I do not credit my employers with firing me out of sheer disinterested and far-seeing benevolence (though some of them, it is true, told me in puzzled tones that I was a bright lad, in my way, and would doubtless get along all right at something else!)—but at all events there was no brutal endeavor to turn me into a captain of industry. To be sure, I had the incomparable advantage of being the son of a poor family; my father could mildly suggest to me that I ought to go to a business college, but I could cheerfully disregard his suggestion, with no hard feelings on either side. Perhaps the social tyranny of which so much is heard today really refers to worried middle-class parental efforts on behalf of young people who, on the other hand, are anxious to be out of the nest—an economic aspect of the well-known father-complex! Be that as it may, I did not suffer from the respectable commercial compulsions which are supposed to be inflicted upon all American youth. No one so much as lifted a finger to prevent my becoming an artist.

On the other hand, well-meaning efforts were sometimes made to assist me in my career. I remember how, my ambitions being discovered by some of the good people of the town where I lived, there was a plan afoot to take me from my factory job and give me an education; and I was invited to dinner to meet a man whose philanthropies took the form of sending deserving lads through college. The conversation after dinner turned upon college; and I, unwitting of the plan, spoiled it—as I afterward learned—by scornfully denouncing college as a waste of time for one who, like me, was able to think for himself; such a one, I declared, could get a better education at the public library and the Socialist local than at any college in America! Which I was thereupon permitted to prove.

But these are not the recognitions and encouragements of which I wish to speak. It is another sort that moves my devout gratitude. Being taken from the first as the sort of person I was, I found a succession of older people who gave me the only help which I can conceive as being really worth having. In the first place they accepted me, a raw boy, as a fellow-enthusiast in all sorts of intellectual and idealistic concerns; they ignored the gulf of age and experience between us and treated me as an equal, a citizen with them in these realms of thought. And in this supposedly busy and efficient world, heedful only of money-making, I never failed to find such people. Sometimes they were my school-teachers; the public library enshrined the most gracious of them all; but they were also to be found in offices, where they never seemed to be too busy to stop and talk with me for an hour about the utterly impractical enthusiasms we had in common. I found them at Socialist meetings and in churches, in newspaper offices and on farms. We were friends by virtue of a community of enthusiasm. And it has never occurred to me to envy on behalf of my youth those more urbane old-world societies of another era where a young man of talent could have, on terms gratifying to his hungry young egotism, the companionship and conversation of beautiful and witty women, of sage and kindly men; for I had it. I must perforce believe when I am told by critics of American life that such men and women are all too few; but I found those few. They enriched my youth with their beauty and wisdom until it glows golden in my memory.

But this sharing of impersonal enthusiasms was not all these friendships afforded. That was all I knew enough to demand; but I received something else, of even greater significance. It is rather hard to describe, for it was merely candid talk, about the world, about life and love, and about themselves. Yet it was not a small thing. These people, having lived in the world, having suffered and loved and thought, had something stored away in their hearts needing to be told but not to be told idly. And they told me. It was as if they had said: "You are the sort of person who ought to know what I have to tell; perhaps you won't understand it—but neither do I. And it isn't a thing that concerns only myself; it seems to belong to you, too."

I don't know if I have made clear the nature of this talk. I resent instructive discourse, and am restless under propaganda. There was no argumentative purpose in the talk of my friends. They might have a certain view of the world, and it might be apparent enough in what they said; but it was not an effort to convert me to anything, or to persuade me of anything. What I might do with it was a matter of indifference; but it was felt to be somehow rightfully a part of my education. I must know truth—not a grand abstraction but particular and intimate truth—about life and love, and about themselves as persons who had lived and loved. There was a candor about these revelations to which fiction with its orderly rearrangements of the chaos of human experience can only feebly aspire; it was something one can scarcely get from books, but only from the talk of friendship—the raw, sweet, harsh, terrible, beautiful stuff of life itself.

* This is the eighth of a series of articles by American writers of the first rank, answering in the light of their general experience the question: Can a literary artist function freely in the United States? Other articles will follow. Mary Austin, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Zona Gale, Edgar Lee Masters, Ludwig Lewisohn, and Sinclair Lewis have hitherto contributed.

I have been told that there is in America a social conspiracy to conceal from the young the nature of life, to oblige them to accept pretty and absurd conventions about it the falsity of which they must painfully discover—and waste years in discovering—for themselves. So it may be; but what I am better acquainted with is this generous and disinterested effort of those who had lived to impart to one just beginning life their hard-won sense of its cruelty and beauty. They wanted to tell.

This seems to me a thrilling and a lucky experience for any young artist; one of the happiest possible circumstances of his youth, outweighing all the hurts to which he is exposed by virtue of being of that sensitive tribe out of which artists are made; and full of obscure but profound encouragement to artistic achievement—if only by way of justifying in his art these tokens of confidence from those who so early knew him for what he was. And I should hate to believe—I do not believe—that this experience is unique in American life.

The Political Theory of Harold J. Laski

By WALTER JAMES SHEPARD

THE present is one of those transitional epochs in the development of political ideas which are the product of changed and changing conditions in the objective field of institutions. The industrial revolution with all its consequences of an elaborate and complex economic and social institutionalism compels a reappraisal of the eighteenth-century ideology which has lingered on in the minds of men. Out of this shaking up of the dry bones of outworn theory there may eventually emerge a body of generalizations more realistic and more truly explanatory of the actual facts with which we are confronted.

Among those who challenge the orthodox interpretation of the nature of the state, Harold J. Laski takes a preeminent place. He is the foremost exponent of the view which has come to be described as "political pluralism." His first important work, "The Problem of Sovereignty," appeared in 1917. His other significant volumes include "Authority in the Modern State," 1919; "Political Thought from Locke to Bentham," 1920; "The Foundations of Sovereignty," 1921; and finally "A Grammar of Politics," very recently off the press.¹ In addition to this substantial product of less than a decade's labor there are a considerable number of important articles in legal and political journals to be placed to Mr. Laski's credit. In general his earlier works may be said to constitute a devastating attack upon the orthodox theory of state sovereignty. In his latest and most ambitious undertaking he attempts a constructive proposal for a reformed political and economic order.

The demolition of the doctrine of state sovereignty was an indispensable preliminary to the elaboration of constructive proposals. This ancient dogma has indeed been subjected to raking fire in recent years from a number of quarters. It stands so directly athwart the development of any effective system of international control, and is so manifestly inconsistent with the already attained actuality of international law and international organization, that a general consensus is rapidly being reached among international lawyers definitely casting it into the discard. United States Senators may still oppose our entrance into the League of Nations on the ground that this would violate the sacred principle of our national sovereignty, but to more serious students of international affairs such arguments appear highly doctrinaire. The notion of state sovereignty has suffered such a serious breach externally that it no longer offers effective resistance to the impact of internationalism. It is on its internal side that the idea still holds the field, albeit somewhat shaken. And it is against this intrenched position that Mr. Laski has directed his most formidable attacks.

The doctrine of the sovereignty of the state, like all important political doctrines, was the direct product of historical events. During the Middle Ages there was no recognized supreme power. Pope and emperor, baron and free city contested with the king for the position of highest authority. But eventually the national state emerged from the medieval chaos and its king made good his claim to unlimited legal power. The doctrine of sovereignty was first clearly formulated in connection with his contest for supremacy. It was for him a useful weapon, and moreover served a useful social purpose. The times demanded a strong, centralized national state. But the theory was never a completely valid explanation of the facts. Even at the height of monarchical absolutism the church continued to enjoy rights which the state could not question, and simple folk continued to buy and sell, to marry and bequeath their property according to laws of immemorial usage—laws which the king, embodiment though he was of the state's sovereign authority, could not successfully modify.

With the appearance of constitutional government the idea of monarchical sovereignty gave way to that of parliamentary sovereignty, and that in turn to the notion of popular sovereignty. Difficulties appeared in connection with federal states, and curious paradoxical conceptions of divided sovereignty emerged. In England, according to the leading writer on constitutional law, there is both a legal sovereign, parliament, and a political sovereign, the people, though we are left in doubt as to whether by "people" is meant the electorate or the more inclusive but quite amorphous mass of the population from which the intangible but increasingly potent force of public opinion emanates. To locate the elusive sovereign has sufficiently taxed the ingenuity of such able protagonists of the orthodox doctrine as Professor W. W. Willoughby, who finds it ultimately, in the United States, in a process—the amending process. Surely it is a far cry from the Grande Monarque of seventeenth-century France, whose vaunt "L'état c'est moi" could scarcely be challenged, to the procedure by which the Eighteenth and Nineteenth amendments were enacted, requiring as they did the concurrent action of seventy-four separate deliberative assemblies.

One might suppose that these embarrassments would have long since raised serious doubts concerning the realistic value of the doctrine of sovereignty. But strange to say, it weathered these storms well-nigh unscathed. It was left to Mr. Laski to direct an attack from a different quarter. Building on the previous work of Professor F. W. Maitland ("Political Theories of the Middle Age") and Professor J. Neville Figgis ("Churches in the Modern State"), he investigated the nature of corporate bodies—all the multifarious economic, ecclesiastical, and social groups which give color and character to our modern civilization. And his conclusions were two: First, these corporations or group-units are real and not fictitious entities. The state's act of incorporation does not create, but merely recognizes a preexisting juristic personality which possesses an independent will of its own and is an independent subject and object of rights. It is significant that in recognizing the suability of unincorporated trade unions the highest court in England in the Taff-Vale case and the Supreme Court of the United States in the Coronado case have gone a long distance toward accepting this view. Second, the state is discovered to be merely a particular kind of corporation, one species of the general genus "corporation." The implications of this new concept of corporations were drawn, so far as the church was concerned, by Professor Figgis; primarily pleading for a "free church in a free state," he definitely attacked the doctrine of state sovereignty. Like the family, the church is not the creature of the state but finds its origin in the social life of man, its justification in the satisfaction of social needs. It is obvious that the same conclusions can be drawn with regard to such economic group-units as trade unions, and it is here that Mr. Laski has perhaps made his most significant contribution. It is insisted that they are corporate personalities with wills of their own, and with rights of their own which the state must not invade.

Though emphasizing the reality and significance of groups as independent centers of rights, Mr. Laski—in this differing from some other pluralists—finds the ultimate criterion of value in the individual. The enlightened will of the individual is for him the final basis of authority. Indeed, the individual is possessed of certain fundamental, inherent rights. This sounds like a revamping of the thoroughly discredited eighteenth-century theory of natural rights, but it is not. For Mr. Laski, individual rights are not God-given or Nature-given, but constitute that minimum of liberty which human experience has demonstrated is essential to the maintenance of the "good life." "Rights, in fact, are those conditions of social life without which no man can seek, in general, to be himself at his best," and "in any state the demands of each citizen for the fulfillment of his best self must be taken as of equal worth." "The theory of rights is the avenue to a creative view of politics." Rights are not emanations of the state's will; they exist independently of it; to secure them the state, like other associations, exists and finds its raison d'être. Such rights, grounded upon historical experience, at least include liberty of thought and word and of assembly, a minimum of education, and an opportunity to work, to receive a wage that will secure such a standard of living, and to enjoy so much leisure as is necessary to realize the possibilities of the good life. Mr. Laski does not believe that historical experience warrants the inclusion of the "right to property." It is not essential to the good life.

tempts the framing of a system of political and economic institutions through which these rights may be practically secured. The formulation of a concrete program of reform is always a dangerous experiment. Nevertheless there is a real value in such undertakings. They may in some respects shoot wide of the mark. They are certain to be characterized as visionary and utopian. But if there is ever to be a real science of politics, such efforts at constructive statesmanship must be made. They are not visionary if they are grounded on a thorough analysis of the facts of life; they are not utopian if they embody the sound principles and ideals which such an analysis discovers.

On the political side there appears no very radical departure from accepted ideas. The organization of government follows in general plan that of the parliamentary or cabinet type on the English model, and is operated through a biparty system. The most important changes are a written constitution amendable only by an unusual and difficult procedure; the principle of judicial review; a unicameral legislature; a system of legislative committees paralleling and in close organic relation with the departments of the administration; a quasi-judicial system of committee hearings in connection with legislation, affording opportunity for the utilization of the technical information and advice of officials in the permanent civil service; an elaborate system of advisory committees through which the public is brought into organic relation with the administration; and a high degree of geographical decentralization of the administration and local self-government. There is certainly nothing in any of these proposals of a particularly startling or revolutionary character.

It is when Mr. Laski undertakes a description of the economic organization for a reformed commonwealth that his pluralistic philosophy bears radical fruit in an elaborate scheme of industrial democracy. Industries are of three types, each of which must be organized on a different principle. First are those which are urgently affected with a public character and by nature are monopolistic. Nationalization is for these the solution; the element of private profit must here be entirely eliminated. The second class include those industries which produce urgent or at least socially desirable commodities, but which are not monopolistic in nature. Agriculture is a typical example. Here there is a large place for the individual producer, but the interest of the community is paramount. Considerable variety of organization is possible. In the case of the more urgent commodities, such as milk and bread, the less opportunity afforded for private profit the better. Since they primarily affect the householder, they constitute the natural province of consumers' cooperatives. Those industries which produce less urgent but still socially desirable commodities might be organized privately in the form of joint-stock companies or as producers' guilds, for which Mr. Laski foresees a considerable future. They would in either case be subjected to a high degree of governmental regulation. The third class of industries are those whose product is not vested with any public character. Cosmetics is an example. These might be organized in any fashion, and would be subjected to governmental regulation only so far as it was necessary to secure adequate standards of wages, hours of labor, working conditions, and the like, and a real share for the workers in determining these.

On the basis of this analysis there is projected a most ingenious and complex system of economic institutions. At the apex is a Ministry of Production charged with the function of supervising and coordinating the various agencies in the entire mechanism of industry. For each nationalized industry there is a subordinate Minister of Production. The actual control of each of these industries, however, is vested in a Governing Board and District Boards, composed of three elements: management, including technical experts; the various vocations, manual and clerical; and the public. The District Boards appoint the managers of the individual factories and mines through a system of open competition. In each industrial unit there is a Works Council which, in constant touch with the manager, confers on the day-to-day grievances which arise in the administration. The fundamental questions of wages and hours are national in scope and their determination should be uniform throughout the industry. This is accomplished through agreements between the Governing Board or District Boards and representatives of the national vocational associations or trade unions.

Intriguing as are Mr. Laski's proposals they can scarcely be expected immediately to attract a very great host of adherents. But if it is true, as can hardly be denied, that our highly technicalized and complex twentieth-century industrial system is subjected to an utterly inadequate and obsolete scheme of social control, dating for the most part from the eighteenth century or earlier, a somewhat daring inventiveness in suggesting reforms is to be cordially welcomed. Certainly in approaching the consideration of the practical desirability of such changes as Mr. Laski proposes we ought not to permit outworn shibboleths from the distant past, like that of state sovereignty, to drown the voice that may be prophetic for our own time.

Books

First Glance

THE key to "Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years," by Carl Sandburg (Harcourt, Brace: 2 vols. $10), is a sentence in the preface. "The folk-lore Lincoln," says Mr. Sandburg, "the maker of stories, the stalking and elusive Lincoln is a challenge for any artist." Or, if it is not that sentence, it is another one quoted later on from Carlyle, who, writing to Emerson concerning the invasion of the West by Yankees "with most occult unsubduable fire in their belly," broke out: "Oh, if we were not a set of Cant-ridden blockheads, there is no myth of Athene of Herakles equal to this fact;—which I suppose will find its real 'Poets' some day or other; when once the Greek, Semitic, and multifarious other cobwebs are swept away a little!" It is Sandburg the artist, the epic poet, who has attacked this largest and most complicated of all American subjects—the subject being, of course, not merely Lincoln himself, though Lincoln was complicated enough, but in addition the whirlpool of cultures out of which he was flung into fame. Nor does Mr. Sandburg seem to believe that he has finished the job. As Standish O'Grady's "History of Ireland" spaded up legends for Yeats and Synge to cultivate, so this epic in the rough will turn the pens of coming poets, it is implied, in fruitful directions. "Perhaps poetry, art, human behavior in this country, which has need to build on its own traditions, would be served by a life of Lincoln stressing the fifty-two years previous to his Presidency."

I should hasten to say that although I find Mr. Sandburg's book amply and profoundly beautiful I find it so in spite of some rather obvious "poetry" stuck in here and there. "Beyond Indiana was something else," we are told—something much more vague, I suspect, than anything in Lincoln's mind ever was. It is annoying to hear from page to page in the first volume of some tender transcendental want that "still lived in him, lived far under in him, in the deeper blue pools of him." There is no harm in a paragraph like that which ends the thirty-sixth chapter:

If a blizzard stopped blowing and the wind went down, with the white curve of a snow floor over Salem Hill looking up to a far blue scoop of winter stars blinking white and gold, with loneliness whispering to loneliness, a man might look on it and feel organization and testimony in the movement of the immense, relentless hubs and sprockets on the sky.

But, in view of Mr. Sandburg's general purpose, there is no particular good in it either.

For the poetry Mr. Sandburg was after, I take it, was the poetry immanent in the facts. And on facts—thousands of them—he ultimately rests his excellent case. He seems to have done an immense amount of what for him was the right kind of research. He walked and talked through the many towns of Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois where people had known Lincoln. He explored, I am sure, all of the Lincoln literature which had something personal to tell. He read bundles of letters and ran his hands over shelves containing mementos. He pushed his mind to the outermost limits of the world which was to influence Lincoln and which he was to influence—the world of European and American politics, industry, travel, science, letters, religion, and art. He familiarized himself with distant contemporaries—Audubon, Melville, Emerson, P. T. Barnum, Walt Whitman. Then he drew his imagination back to make itself at home in the civilization which actually shaped Lincoln, or helped to shape him. Here is God's plenty indeed. Here is the lining of the old Mid-Western mind. Here are the songs all people sang, the poems they recited, the proverbs they spoke, the superstitions they could not discard, the machines they used, the clothes they wore, the facts they learned in the newspapers, the gods they swore by, the dishes they ate, the jests they laughed at. As Mr. Sandburg goes on he becomes drunk with data, and in true Homeric fashion compiles long lists of things. "Orchards were being planted with new kinds of apple trees, Winter Sweets, Red Streaks, Red Russets, Yellow Hearts, Rainbows." "And there were horses, and men riding and driving who loved horses . . . roans, grays, whites, black horses with white stockings, sorrels with a sorrel forelock down a white face, bays with a white star in the forehead. . . . They spoke of one-horse towns, one-horse lawyers, and one-horse doctors—even of one-horse horse doctors."

Of Mr. Sandburg's picture of Lincoln himself—Lincoln inside and out—it is more difficult to speak. I prefer to leave it quite unspoiled. Few men and women are truly mysterious. Lincoln was, and in my opinion Mr. Sandburg has presented the elements of that mystery more subtly and more completely than I have ever seen them presented before. Jasper Conant recorded that as he began to paint the candidate for President in 1860 "there came over his face the most marvelously complex expression I have ever seen." Mr. Sandburg comes as near as any man could come to telling why.

'The Fanatic of Liberty'

Jefferson and Hamilton: The Struggle for Democracy in America. By Claude G. Bowers. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

Correspondence of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson [1812-1826]. Selected with Comment by Paul Wiltach. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Jefferson et les Idéologues d'après sa Correspondance Inédite avec Destutt de Tracy, Cabanis, J.-B. Say, et Auguste Comte. Par Gilbert Chinard. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. $2.

HAS the predominance of reactionaries in American politics revived the memory of Jefferson, "the fanatic of liberty" as he called himself? Mr. Bowers disclaims any purpose in writing his volume that lies outside the circle of historic truth; yet so saturated has the emotional life of Americans become with democratic idealism, in spite of their practice, that he is assured that an honest exposition of Hamiltonian doctrines will result in the condemnation of these doctrines in the popular court. The vividness of his slashing style makes the verdict inevitable. With the other two volumes the evidence of purposive labor is not so obvious. Possibly Mr. Wiltach visualized the educational value for Klansmen and fundamentalists of a correspondence about politics, philosophy, and religion between two spirits whom old age and retirement from public life had set free. In the writer of the third book we have a student who is exploiting in a succession of volumes a rich mine long neglected by American students. The answer to my question is not so obvious, as might be expected; still my inclination is to discover in the growing interest in the apostle of democracy an unconscious rebound from the forces of capitalism entrenched in the seat of government. Mr. Bowers closes his volume with the statement: "The spirits of Jefferson and Hamilton still stalk the ways of men—still fighting." Today no doubt the spirit of Hamilton is chortling. The campaign of 1800 has been avenged.

To make known the traditions of a people is the one function of the historian which can be justified, for the past has created the social psychic environment in which the present generation grew to manhood. Now no man, whether he be Washington or Lincoln, has done so much to create the mental stereotypes dominating our political emotions as did Thomas Jefferson, the chopper of psychic kindling wood for American political fires. Unfortunately, political stereotypes become, like religious dogmas, inelastic, aberrant, and inhibitive. Possibly they may be cured by a bath in the fountain whence they issued. Certainly no evil will result from a clearer knowledge of Jefferson and his ideals.

Mr. Bowers has the ability to write a most interesting story of what he calls "the Plutarchian struggle"—meaning, doubtless, Homeric—of Jefferson and Hamilton. His career as newspaper editor has fitted him for the task. Experience has taught him an understanding of men and politics; and with understanding there has come to him a broad toleration of all species of belief and disbelief, of faith and skepticism. His chief interest, as a historian, is the evolution of men's divergent opinions and their consequent antagonism. In the fight of the protagonists of democracy and oligarchy in the opening years of our national life he has a great subject, to the dramatic character of which he does full justice. Possibly the reader will not think that this work reveals as much originality as the author's "Party Battles of the Jackson Period." One reason is obvious. The period has been studied more carefully and more frequently than the one in which the "General" figured; and Mr. Bowers, in spite of his boast that he has dispersed many myths, has little that is new to tell the student who is familiar with the monographic literature. But Mr. Bowers is writing primarily for the general reader. So he has prepared himself well by the study of contemporary newspapers and pamphlets, the writings of public men, and the interpretations of his forerunners. The result is a most readable book. We, therefore, can forgive him his occasional misuse of words, some ill-constructed sentences, and a few errors such as the reversal of the roles of Otis and Adams in the court where was argued the Writs of Assistance; for his drama, although crowded with figures, never lags, never wearies the reader, never loses the theme. Even the minor characters, and they are numerous, enter upon their parts with flesh, blood, and passions, as they appeared to their contemporaries.

Mr. Wiltach in his selection of the Adams-Jefferson correspondence quotes a commentary of Mr. Adams upon this Homeric political struggle which Mr. Bowers has so seriously portrayed:

The real terrors of both parties have always been, and now are, the fear that they shall lose the election, and, consequently, the loaves and fishes; and that their antagonists will obtain them. Both parties have excited artificial terrors, and if I were summoned as a witness to say, upon oath, which party had excited, Machiavellially, the most terror, and which had really felt the most, I could not give a more sincere answer than in the vulgar style, put them in a bag and shake them and then see which comes out first.

Jefferson was probably not so convinced as Adams was that his fight against Hamilton was of a fictitious character. In his correspondence with his former opponent Adams and with the French philosophers he remained faithful to his democratic creed. His French friends agreed with him; in fact, as reaction closed down upon them, they turned their eyes with longing to America, where the great experiment they had hoped to try was working itself out. To them Jefferson's administration had raised the experiment to the realm of reality. Democracy had been tried and had succeeded. The sage of Monticello was the savior of the liberty of the world, and to him all opponents of monarchy bent their knees. From 1800 till his death Jefferson occupied a unique position, the counselor of American Presidents and the hero of European liberals.

Opponents have so frequently called Jefferson a theorist that popular opinion is inclined to place him among the impractical dreamers and to contrast him with Hamilton, who is supposed to have followed a Realpolitik. The opposite is nearer the truth. Hamilton, maladroit in act and obstinate in thought, ran counter—as Mr. Bowers makes plain—to the reality in which he lived. Jefferson was a man of action, a crafty politician, understanding the social forces of his time and knowing how to utilize and guide them. In his correspondence he reveals himself as a man turning from theories to seek the solid facts of life. In one of his letters he sets forth his creed:

These dreams of the day, like those of the night, vanish in vapor, leaving not a wreck behind. The business of life is with matter. That gives us tangible results. Handling that, we arrive at the knolege (sic) of the axe, the plough, the steamboat, and everything useful in life; but from metaphysical speculations I have never seen one useful result.

CLARENCE WALWORTH ALVORD

A Peculiar Wanderer

Seventy Summers. By Poultney Bigelow. Longmans, Green and Company. Two volumes. $10.

I HAVE no doubt I should like Mr. Bigelow, though I should differ from him violently upon every matter of opinion. There is something racy and courageous about him. In a wandering life he has acquired a great amount of information, derived from life itself and not from other people's books. He has visited many lands between China and Panama, and he has kept his eyes well open. He has met and sometimes known many famous and significant people in the four main continents, and what he has to say about them is often shrewd and occasionally kindly. As a journalist he has shown a fine independence, and has taken the good and evil fortunes of our hazardous profession with equal thanks, though the fortunes seem to have been chiefly evil. In the end he has retired into what stands for "nature" on the reaches of the Hudson, and indeed there is a touch of the wild about him throughout—a refreshing touch. He writes a clear and vigorous language, though he splits his infinitives so violently as to give me a slight shock, from time to time, as though my car had run over a dog. But one gets accustomed to those little accidents.

I suppose I must count it to his credit also that he admires my country and our people more than any other. At least I think he does, for he often holds our policy and government and manners up to admiration in comparison with those of less happy lands, and he is not given to admiration—far from it. He admires England so much that, though from boyhood he had been acquainted with the ex-Kaiser, he broke off that acquaintanceship after the Kaiser's telegram to Kruger congratulating him on the defeat of the Jameson raid. And he admires English people so much that he writes in praise even of Mr. Gladstone, after a long and interesting conversation with him, though he must have disagreed savagely with every principle of Gladstone's life. If Mr. Bigelow had been born an Englishman, I think he would have grown into a cranky old Die-Hard, resolutely opposing all extensions of democracy and all advances of "progress." I can well imagine him as a crusted English squire, healthy, fond of sport, kindly to his tenants so long as they obeyed his caprices and voted Tory, enjoying his port wine, his solid food, and the company of pretty women, loving his horses and dogs, tolerating the parson as useful for keeping the poor in order, enthusiastic for war, and devoted to his country, which he daily said was going to the dogs, though he loved dogs, as before mentioned.

I suppose such a character to be rather rare in the United States, and perhaps that is why Mr. Bigelow so seldom speaks well of his own countrymen. He seems to hate nearly all of your best-known men, regarding each with indifferent contempt. Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, Henry Ford, Booker Washington, Harold Frederic, Joaquin Miller, the Astors and the Vanderbilts—I really could not decide about which of them he says the most unpleasant things. He often reminds me of the young man who came to John Morley asking for journalistic work on the ground that he was specially good at vituperation. He admires Henry George for his "Progress and Poverty," and he admires Mary Anderson for her beauty, he being as susceptible to beauty as the rest of us. But there is something almost superb in his outspoken abuse of most other celebrated names; and if they are American names, so much the worse for them. Writing of the "Rough Riders" in your Spanish War, he begins a long denunciation of Roosevelt thus:

Roosevelt is otherwise notable. He is the first American President who has from the beginning to the end of his career commercialized himself, and held out for the highest bidder.

From the numerous attacks upon the memory of President Wilson I take the first that comes:

Mr. Wilson was acclaimed by France and England as a savior, whilst in fact he was merely a political impostor. . . . He went [to Paris] in order to please a wife who insisted on royal honors without having the faintest preliminary experience of that quality which royalty practices in the name of noblesse oblige. . . . He consulted no one in Paris but journalists who flattered him, and politicians of his own pacifistic and socialistic twist of mind.

So Mr. Bigelow goes on throughout the two volumes, and though we all enjoy seeing the weaknesses of the great exposed, such continuous abuse becomes a little monotonous. Yet one cannot help liking the man for his courage and freedom from pretense or snobbery. Neither rank nor riches can win his admiration, and in passing I might just warn him that he is utterly mistaken when he writes of the "much-coveted order of the British Empire." Under Mr. Lloyd George that order was sentered so profusely that the only distinction connected with it is not to possess it. If I ever had the honor of meeting Mr. Bigelow in his woodland home I know we should fight on everything, and yet I should enjoy being with him, just as I have enjoyed reading his book, though I detest almost every opinion in it. One word more: the author is not prudish. I hardly know how he can go on in so modest a State as New York, or what he would do on Coney Island under the notice: "Do not disrobe here, or you will be arrested." Mr. Bigelow disrobes anywhere.

HENRY W. NEVINSON

Crime and Punishment

An American Tragedy. By Theodore Dreiser. Boni and Liveright. $5.

MR. DREISER'S new novel is the crowning achievement of the work which he began a quarter of a century ago. To him it seemed then that novelists had lost themselves in their own refinement, that, enamored of moral delicacy and psychological subtleties, they had forgotten the simple motives by which the vast majority of mankind are moved; so with a single shrug he sloughed off once and for all the implications of the theory that man is primarily a moral animal and he did this much as the behaviorists in psychology sloughed off the soul. Let us, he said in effect, take life as I have observed it and let us see if it may not be explained upon the basis of what was afterwards called, in a brilliant analysis of his world, "a theory of animal conduct." Thus he began and thus, with a dogged insistence almost unmatched in literature, he has continued, unshaken by vituperation or neglect and unchanged by a growing fame; content to interpret an ugly world in terms of an ugly theory.

It is not, be it understood, that he denies the existence of delicate feelings or of moral restraints. The present book begins with a scene in which the family of Clyde, the hero, send up from a street corner the plaintive wail of a hymn which beats against the wall of a skyscraper and loses itself in the passing throng. Clyde himself is not unaware of the moral precepts which his parents have inculcated, nor is he unmoved by the thought of another's pain. But these things are pale shadows in comparison with needs and lusts which are nourished not by ideas and habits but by blood. They may go forth to battle but they never win; they may haunt the mind like overtones or like ghosts but they never direct a crucial action. Given a man strong enough, the lust for flesh and for power will lead him, if chance happens to favor, through the career of "The Financier"; given a man weak as the hero of "An American Tragedy" and, fortune against him, he will end with murder and the electric chair. One may revolt and rage if one likes; one may deny to Dreiser any universality for his philosophy; but one may not deny him his novels. He himself may choose what stories he wishes to tell, and no one can question either the ring of truth in the incidents or the adequacy of the motive assigned. Thus and for these reasons murders are done.

Dostoevski told once and for all the story of a meta-physical murder, he showed how an idea born of logic and carried through to a logical conclusion might lead a man by a series of reasonable steps to take a life. But murderers are not ordinarily moral philosophers, and Dreiser has told with almost equal fidelity the story of one of those more typical murders which merely happen. He has shown a young man, neither better nor worse than thousands, led step by step into a situation from which it seems that murder alone can furnish an escape. He has shown him caught in a web of pleasant little sins committed at the behest of the common desires indulged by half mankind, and he has shown him so little plotting with deliberate malice that at the instant of the crime itself he had not yet made up his mind whether he would commit it or not. Then, relying still upon the simplest of motives, he has shown how a district attorney with his eye upon a coming election brought Clyde to trial before a jury anxious to wreak its vengeance upon a representative of the privileged class and how thus a fate-driven criminal is brought unjustly to justice. At no point in all the vast and closely woven story does any motive based upon moral, social, or religious abstractions count. Clyde may be explained without them and so, with equal completeness, may those who happened to be in the position to enforce the law against him.

Had Mr. Dreiser substituted for the indefinite "An" of his title the definite "The" he would not have been wholly unjustified, for his story implies, with all the force of a concrete example, the tragic failure of this, the most pretentiously moralistic nation of the world, to live in the main by any law but the law of the jungle. Clyde, born into a family which preached tenets of a fanatical religion and a puritanical morality, observed as no intelligent person can help observing the hopeless inapplicability of that religion and that morality to the world as he found it. He cast them off to live by the commandments which his desires dictated because they alone had, in his experience, any real authenticity; and though a little knowledge or experience of the world as it is might have saved him, no amount of conventional moral instruction or religious training could have done so. Born an animal into an animal world he went clumsily to work to win for himself the satisfactions which all about him were winning, and for his clumsiness he was punished; but the civilization in which he found himself was one which had offered him no choice save that between a feebly sentimental religion and a disastrous experiment in anarchy. He had, in a word, the misfortune to be born in a country which offers in a hundred thousand churches to teach how to renounce life but which considers it highly immoral to teach how to live.

Unfortunately there is no space in a review so brief as this must be to describe the excellences which make this novel a complete justification not only of Mr. Dreiser's theories in so far as they apply to the milieu which he has chosen but of his art as well; it must suffice to say that the story, continuously interesting and continuously terrible, marches forward with a resistless energy. Incident is piled upon incident and fact upon fact, but never—and this distinguishes the present from all the other long novels of the author—does the structure grow unwieldy or the interest falter. Nor, it must be added, do the much-advertised faults of Mr. Dreiser's style come between the reader and the events which he is following; for so absorbing are the things communicated that one forgets completely the manner in which they are communicated—a fact which must mean, I take it, that Mr. Dreiser's style is, for his own purpose, perfect. "An American Tragedy" is, in fine, the greatest of its author's works, and that can hardly mean less than that it is the greatest American novel of our generation.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Admonitions from the Motherland

The Raven on the Skyscraper. By Veronica and Paul King. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 10/.

THIS pained and indignant volume is far more significant as a symbol than as a document. What it reveals is simply the view that prevails in England, in petto but in earnest, of this great Christian Republic. That view seldom gets itself stated in any forthright and hearty manner. The English labor under an unhappy dread of us, and so they try to be very polite to us. There ensue such affecting phenomena as the maudlin hulls of the Sulgrave Foundation, the boozy welcome to the American Bar Association, and the series of flattering addresses by successive British ambassadors. But all that is on the surface. Deep down the English regard us with powerful aversion, and now and then, say when a George Harvey becomes especially offensive, the fact busts out. At longer intervals some English patriot throws over politeness altogether, and rehearses the whole damning bill of complaint. This is what Mr. and Mrs. King have done in the present book. They loathe the United States and they are eager to make the fact known. They see it as a dangerous menace to the security and happiness of England, and hence, by a familiar step, to civilization itself. The Yankee is a mucker and a scoundrel. He has low tastes; he is a hog for money; he aspires absurdly to run the world. Let the guardians of the true morality be up and at him!

Unluckily, the authors wobble a bit when they come down to specifications. How long they sojourned among us I don't know, but their time was chiefly spent, very obviously, in highly dubious society and in the study of somewhat questionable documents. Their principal printed authority, in fact, is Henry Ford's Dearborn Independent, which is almost as if an American in England should put his trust in Lord Riddell's News of the World. They derive from it the theory that the United States is now run by the Jews, and that the Jews have the sinister aim of debauching American morals, reducing Christianity to a hissing and a mocking, and unhorsing the Anglo-Saxon. And what they do not get from the Dearborn Independent they get from the Babylonish excesses of Hollywood. Here they observe a lamentable Totentanz, with even the clergy flinging legs. It is such a tale as wandering friars from Britain brought home from the Byzantium of John Palaeologus. It is thrilling, but I fear that it is somewhat romantic.

"The Raven on the Skyscraper" thus falls considerably below "Americanization: A World Menace," by W. T. Colyer, of the British Labor Party. Colyer's philippic was acute and devastating: he got down to the fundamental weaknesses of the American scheme of things, and set them forth with great shrewdness and no little eloquence. Mr. and Mrs. King seem to be no more than transient and trivial journalists, gaping at the show and accepting the rhetoric of the barkers as gospel truth. But though their book thus fails as document, it remains of interest as symbol. Dislike radiates from it like heat from a stove or idealism from a Rotarian. It is incredibly tart and ill-humored. Only occasionally, and then by a sort of grudging afterthought, does anything American get any praise. Even the late Walter Hines Page is denounced—a fact hard for mortal mind to grasp, but still a fact. He was, it appears, not sufficiently anglomaniacal! As for General Pershing, he is guilty of a sort of misprision of treason: he has permitted the Motherland to be libeled among us without leaping up and yelling "Stop!"

Is there any considerable body of English opinion behind such grotesque arraignments? I believe that there is. I believe, indeed, that the vast majority of Englishmen, high and low, think the same way. The fact is commonly concealed by the discreet politeness of the English and by the extravagant Anglomania of a certain class of Americans, but it remains real none the less. England hates the United States for very sound reasons. We have gradually elbowed her out of first place at the trough. The average American of today is vastly richer than the average Englishman, and, what is more, he feels more secure in the world, and is thus happier. The happy nations are never liked; they are liked least by those peoples who have but lately parted from happiness. The great days of England are obviously done. Her old unchallenged power tends to become no more than a function of American power. She needs and gets our tolerance, but a certain unbearable patronage goes with it. Thus the old English scorn of the accursed Yankee turns into detestation. We are necessary, but we are abominable.

"Sandburg has achieved the crowning success of having done the one book that he, of all men now living, was specially designated to do. John Farrar says—

Christian Science

The Faith, the Falsity, and the Failure of Christian Science. By Woodbridge Riley, Frederick W. Peabody, and Charles E. Humiston. Fleming H. Revell Company. $3.50.

THE spectacle of a well-appearing congregation of intelligent citizens emerging on a Sunday morning from a classical temple in a residential section of a flourishing city is a familiar one in every section of this vast and enlightened continent. To shout from the housetops and in forcible language that this procession of devotees of a spiritual cause is a formidable menace to all that science and religion and even sanity cherish may seem an ungracious act, may even suggest a prejudiced animosity. But such is the mission which this book undertakes and assumes as a moral and scientific obligation—the astounding charges it makes being abundantly justified by convincing evidence. We have here a righteous exposé of one of the most amazing movements in the history of American thought. To the lay observer who knows little of the origin of the cult and has a complacent smile for its vagaries, who knows nothing of its methods past and present, and who has no occasion to meet with the tragedies that follow in the wake of its strange denials, the reading of this account will prove a painful revelation; as also, if it could penetrate widely into the camp of the believers (not a likely consummation), it would prove a bomb-shell. To the man of average intelligence and ordinary humanity it will remain incredible that this all too amply documented story can really be true—incredible that the members of this cult whom he knows and with whom he does business should countenance such gross violations of reason, morality, and many another of the established values of civilization. As he closes the book, or as next he passes the church that shelters these doctrines, he cannot dismiss the hope that it is all a nightmare which will dissolve with the next awakening to the sober realities of the world which he shares with his Christian Science friends.

It is Mr. Riley's part to trace the sources of the doctrines which Mrs. Eddy made current. They are so directly taken from the manuscripts of "Dr." P. P. Quimby, to whom in 1862 she applied for treatment, that no word other than plagiarism can express the relation—an indebtedness acknowledged in her earlier days, but violently repudiated when the originality of Christian Science became a fixed tenet of Mother Eddy's belief. Mrs. Eddy had the use of a copy of the Quimby manuscripts in 1862; they were not printed until 1921 (by Mr. H. W. Dresser). In addition, there are such general sources as a vague mysticism articulate in the philosophy of Bronson Alcott, which Mrs. Eddy "paraphrased"; a folk-lore absorption of demonology; an antagonistic (somewhat Freudian) reaction to animal magnetism (hypnotism); and the personal traits and experiences of Mrs. Eddy, including her three marriages, her accusations and litigations, her delusions of persecution and of grandeur, her cupidity, her ailments and in general her limitations.

Compositely, Mrs. Eddy's actions—of which a course in "metaphysical obstetrics," or a paranoiac dread of "malicious animal magnetism," is as characteristic as the writing of "Science and Health, with Key to the Scriptures"—are intelligible only in the light of her psychopathic personality. Her mental and educational limitations were such that she is presumably responsible only for the cruder, more imitative, jargon-like, and in later editions so carefully reedited and pruned portions of the famous and profitable textbook, and then only as to phrasing, not as to ideas. In the movement she was constantly leaning on others, and with this once launched she was swept on by the current of supporters who in later stages trafficked upon the market-value of her egocentric idiosyncrasies. This is a harsh verdict—though approved by many another student besides Mr. Riley—yet it forms an indispensable part of the diagnosis. That Mr. Riley's contribution to the

37 West 57th Street
New York City

"Cambridge History of American Literature" was suppressed when it appeared some years ago is a familiar story; it is now available. Though inevitably making a case, the author has conceived his task as that of setting in clear relations the sources of an interesting American movement, and he has acquitted himself admirably in the scholarship of this undertaking.

Mr. Peabody is a lawyer who conducted some of the cases which Mrs. Eddy brought to trial. Instead of such chapter-headings as Mysticism, Demonology, Divine Science, Psychoanalysis, we have the plain-spoken titles Autocracy, Suppression, Swindling, Lies, Cash; and these are just as essential to an understanding of the technique by which this amazing movement has succeeded in covering the land with prosperous churches and adding a new denomination to the religious census. The evidence cannot be summarized; it is only by the cumulative enormity of the several financial enterprises and the manner of their prosecution that the reader as jurymen is eventually roused to a high pitch of indignation. However unsympathetic one may be with the movement, one cannot but regret that this sordid aspect of the actual proceedings in the case must be considered; Christian Science has been declared a business as well as a religion. The grasping despotism of the founder and her coadjutors makes a dismal story; that does not seem inherent in such a movement, which would have been equally instructive had the cult progressed as a fanatical but misguided enterprise. Mr. Peabody does not allow sufficiently for the psychopathic distortion of motives and their expression; what in a normal person would be nothing but greed, despotism, cruelty, and prevarication becomes in the psychopath a secondary outlet of delusional trends. Yet enough remains to justify the charges.

It is when we hear the third witness, the doctor, that the actual menace appears and indignation rises to the explosive point. People may be unreasonable in their beliefs, and contentious and grasping and dictatorial in their behavior, and still qualify for a fair measure of esteem, service, and happiness; but when their faith makes them inhumane and blinds them to the most serious realities of life, tolerance becomes a questionable virtue if not a culpable vice. When Dr. Humiston gives the experiences of just one surgeon—and scores are ready to add to his testimony—and tells with gruesome detail of one case after another of death through neglect of medical care and through dependence upon mental demonstrations; when mothers sacrifice their children to "science" and over their open graves cling to the faith that slew them; when every community in the land is exposed to dire contagion by the wilful neglect of the most elementary precautions in response to a belief that disease is a delusion of mortal mind—then the climax of the tale is reached and the role of charity difficult to maintain. The philosophic psychologist discloses the errors of mind and the vanity of delusion; the lawyer sets forth the infringement of the moral code and the attempts to avoid the penalties of criminal infraction; the doctor opens the door upon the spectacle of tortured and sacrificed humanity. It seems strange that there have not been more cases of unstable minds, crazed by a sense of loss, taking the law into their own hands and precipitating a tragedy.

And the paradox remains between this delusive philosophy, this autocratic cupidity, this inhumane disregard, and this procession of poised, kindly faces emerging from classical temples into the sunlight of a scientifically organized, humanized modern world. Fortunately man is not a consistent logical animal; people are better than their professions; and the real social forces that determine their behavior may be counted upon to offset their benighting limitations. We shall all continue to maintain our amicable or neutral relations with our Christian Science neighbors; yet some of us cannot, in the interests of all that we hold valuable, seal our lips or blind our eyes to the lurking menace of this singular American phenomenon.

Relativity and Reality

The A B C of Relativity. By Bertrand Russell. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Ether and Reality. A Series of Discourses on the Many Functions of the Ether of Space. By Sir Oliver Lodge. George H. Doran Company. $2.

The Tyranny of Time. By Charles Nordmann. Translated from the French by E. E. Fournier D'Albe. The International Publishers. $3.25.

IF the general reader finds it hard to catch up with the new notions of the universe following the advent of Einstein it is not for lack of volunteer expositors. Bertrand Russell, who achieved a brilliant success in explaining the theories of Bohr and Planck in his "A B C of the Atom," attempts in these papers, some of which appeared originally in The Nation, to perform the same service for Einstein—or rather for the public. For he sees, what many of his fellow-mathematicians do not, that the public is much concerned in this revolution in fundamental conceptions of science, and that when these become common property they are likely not only to upset conventional ideas of morals and politics but to "alter profoundly the whole texture of human life, since our present absorption in machinery and industrialism is the reflection in the practical world of the theorist's interest in physical laws." The sun is no longer monarch of the solar system, and it exercises no force on the planets. On the contrary, the planets plow through the obstructions in space-time raised by the sun in their center and take the longest and laziest route in getting around it.

To find out how far the Einstein revolution will affect popular thought and action we shall have to wait awhile, several centuries probably, but it is certainly very upsetting to our traditional and customary views. Little is left of the two fundamental laws, the conservation of mass and of energy, which nineteenth-century science regarded as absolute. Time and space no longer form a fixed and eternal framework, but vary with the observer. Whether one event happened before or after another cannot in many cases be determined; there may be a doubtful period, a band of indeterminable simultaneity, varying from seconds or minutes to millions of years. Gravitation is no longer considered to be propagated instantaneously throughout the universe; it may travel with the speed of light. The universe is not infinite but finite and, indeed, measurable. Many of the stars we see in the sky may be mere ghosts of their dead selves, revisiting every thousand million years the scenes of their past life and repeating there their previous performances. And, what is most disconcerting to the historians of science, the old Galileo case is reopened for new evidence.

"Ether and Reality" is a tautological title, for to Sir Oliver Lodge the ether is the real reality. While the younger set of scientists, influenced by Einstein, are disposed to discard ether, like the "force of gravitation," as an unnecessary fiction, the veteran physicist champions its claims with youthful vigor and strives to bring the old conceptions of his science into accord with the ideas of the modernists. To Sir Oliver ether is the most solid and substantial thing in the universe. "It is the densest thing known; there can be nothing more massive than ether: for, being a continuum, it is incompressible." He figures out that ether is 1,000,000,000,000 times as dense as water and is under a pressure represented by 1 followed by thirty-three zeros. Matter is nowadays conceived to be composed of two kinds of electrical corpuscles, negative electrons and positive protons, the former exceedingly light and the latter exceedingly heavy. Lodge finds in the ether a solution to this problem, for he suggests that the electron is a hole in the ether and that its complement, the proton, is crammed with the matter that was taken out of the electron hole.

The ether is the general handy man of the physicists. Whenever they find a phenomenon for which none of the known agencies is adequate, they say "Let ether do it." When the wave theory of light was introduced nothing could be found to do the waving, so this task was imposed upon the ether. When radio waves were discovered the ether was set to carrying them. So now Sir Oliver, believing he has evidence of telepathy and the survival of mind after death, makes the ether the medium of such psychic phenomena. And the ether never rebels, no matter what burdens are placed upon it. Having no manifest properties of its own, it may be endowed with whatever qualities and functions the scientists may desire, however contradictory these may be. Yet the ether seems to have no reason for existence except the need of the human mind, and especially of the Anglo-Saxon mind, for a mechanical analogy.

Charles Nordmann is the most popular of the French advocates of the theory of relativity. The latter part of his new book is taken up with a defense of Einstein against Bergson, who finds the new conceptions of time incompatible with his well-known ideas of time and duration. Nordmann admits that the French critics of relativity have scored a point in pointing out a fallacy in Einstein's illustration of the railroad train in his popular book on "Relativity." But Nordmann holds that it is unfair to condemn Einstein's unimpeachable mathematical theory because he chose a vulnerable analogy in the attempt to make his meaning plain to unmathematical readers. The greater part of the volume has no connection with Einstein polemics; it might have been written years ago, and probably was. In this the author deals with "those meteorological aphorisms which make up nine-tenths of human conversation." He explains how the calendar was formed and how it may be reformed. This historical sketch of clocks, climates, and calendars is written in the familiar and flowery style that made the author's earlier book, "Einstein and the Universe," a favorite with unscientific readers on both sides of the Atlantic.

EDWIN E. SLOSSON

Until Utopia

Tolerance. By Hendrik Willem van Loon. Boni and Liveright. $3.

THOSE who have read Mr. Van Loon's recent books (and there must be a great many such) will have already a pretty good idea of what this one is like. It isn't illustrated, which is a pity, since Mr. Van Loon's illustrations are often more effective than the text; but probably the subject doesn't lend itself to illustration. Otherwise the book has the Van Loon qualities. That is to say, it is discursive in the extreme, intimate, personal, highly subjective, genuinely humane in its sympathy even to the verge of sentimentalism, with quick shifts to the verge of cynicism as if to remind the reader, confidentially, that although kind hearts are indeed more than coronets no one need suppose that the sophisticated author can be easily duped.

Apart from such and other personal eccentricities and quaint conceits, which please some and repel others but which are neither here nor there, Mr. Van Loon's writings have three qualities which are worth attending to. The writing itself is generally good—unconventional, concise, simple, vivid, plastic, fitting easily the exact form of the thought. The thought at its best, which is not always, shows real imaginative understanding of people past and present and of the motives all compact of wisdom and folly which inspire them to mean or great action. The purpose of the thought and writing, or at least the purpose that most concerns the public, is to enable ordinary folk to learn something from history by showing them that people do now, under various disguises, very much what they did formerly under other disguises; so that, to take the present book, it is a cardinal mistake to suppose that we are no longer intolerant because we no longer burn people for religious heresy. Painfully elbowing my way out of a theater once, after witnessing Shaw's "Saint Joan," I heard a top-hatted gentleman say: "Well, it is good to think that nothing like that can happen now." This was, I suppose, to miss the whole point of the play. The gentleman was a shining example of Shaw's own dictum that the only thing we learn from history is that we don't learn anything. Mr. Van Loon, I think, really wishes to show people that the same things (as, for example, intolerance) persist from age to age under different forms.

But if Mr. Van Loon is not too complacent about our achievements up to date, he appears to take the view, or at least to entertain the hope, that poor Humanity is moving, however stumblingly, onward and upward. One gathers that there has been for two thousand years a "struggle for tolerance" going on, and that sometime in the future the happy day will dawn when, fear having been cast out, tolerance and humane feeling will reign triumphant. Well, it may be so, who knows? Best, at all events, to assume as much; for old Humanity will doubtless be more disposed to do well if we trust it a little, if we have faith to gamble on its hidden virtues and capacities. I am willing to do that. But I often wonder what will happen when Utopia is established. What, for example, will be the use and merit of tolerance when all are tolerant? Will people then soon forget the high value of tolerance and lapse into persecution from sheer boredom? Perhaps a history of tolerances would be nearer the objective facts than a history of tolerance. But still I commend Mr. Van Loon's book. I think it may be safely read, and with profit to readers by and large. Utopia is not so near that we need as yet take cruel and unusual precautions against the boredom of unrelieved virtue.

Two Artists and a Critic

Renoir: an Intimate Record. By Ambroise Vollard. Translated by Harold L. Van Doren and Randolph T. Weaver. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

The Last Years of Rodin. By Marcelle Tirel. Translated by R. Francis. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

Personalities in Art. By Royal Cortissoz. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

THE contempt of the artist for the critic is a recurrent note in the first two of these books, and the third, by America's most established art critic, unconsciously helps to explain and justify this proverbial antipathy. Each of the artists, when unrecognized and poor, endured from established critics the usual supercilious dismissal of his work as utterly unimportant, then the alarmed invectives of these defenders of national culture as his reputation grew nevertheless, and last of all the fawning compliments of the same and similar personages, eager to jump on the band-wagon, reminding the "Maitre" of their lifelong friendship, and begging for some signed product of his genius. Mr. Cortissoz is the perfect example of the Salon or academic type of critic, a generation too late with his courageous praise of Renoir and Monet, and still condemning with stale and empty phrases about "unloveliness" and "lack of quality" the man whom Renoir and Monet delighted to honor—Cézanne. A still more recent innovator, whom Mr. Cortissoz ridicules, Renoir in his old age was young enough to appreciate. "Wasn't it you, Vollard, who told me that Matisse had been refused at the Autumn Salon? It's curious how people are positively repelled by real painter qualities in a picture." "Personalities in Art" abounds in garrulous anecdotes which are urbane and mildly entertaining for a time, but become more and more tiresome as they flutter aimlessly about, far from any real contact with either aesthetic values or significant personalities in art.

Vollard's reminiscences, on the contrary, teem with anecdotes that amuse and at the same time reveal a great and amiable personality. They are packed, besides, with good Singleton," all popular in their time, were not moved, in their essays into pure letters, toward an extraneous satisfaction—one may say, toward a repudiation of spiritual autonomy for the public advantage of familiar properties.

Mr. Hemingway and Mr. Dos Passos are writers of unusual integrity in this respect, though what they share is not a quality of style or method but simply a seriousness, a care for good prose in itself, that would exclude them from the inquiry of Mr. Stuart Sherman who discovers "significant novelists." Mr. Dos Passos may be said nevertheless to have partly measured the current taste, or to be caught in some of its deeper extensions, in so far as he has written a book the design of which is loosely episodic and has little organic relation to the implicit tendency of his subject matter—unlike the design, which is form and is identical with vision, in Henry James and Proust.

For in "Manhattan Transfer" design and style evince a noteworthy disparity. As to style, Mr. Dos Passos, here no less than in "Three Soldiers," is usually swift, vigorous, dynamic. That the person who achieved this precise notation of sound and motion can write there can be no doubt: "The minute rusty bird flew ahead, perched on a telegraph wire and sang, and flew ahead to the rim of an abandoned boiler and sang, and flew ahead and sang." But he has attempted to envisage such inchoate materials that the incumbrance wearies his capacity for fresh observation. The vigorous perception of one scene becomes the creaking device of the next. Houses begin regularly to smell of toothpaste, cabbage, soiled clothes; streets, of wet brick, garbage, immigrants. The verb "jiggle" occurs every three pages in a novel of about two hundred thousand words.

Yet Mr. Dos Passos has contributed a new point of reference to the American consciousness; henceforth our milieu is altered. "Manhattan Transfer" is a tableau of New York life from the first years of this century through the war; it brings an astonishing variety of characters, from every level of society, through the spiritual crisis of this period. He has approached the material as an artist. But he has not focused it. The novel lacks all unity of projection. It is controlled simply by the mechanism of time; it could have begun anywhere, and as arbitrarily ended. The treatment is entirely from without; Mr. Dos Passos, at crises, does not distinguish the significant action, inherent in character, from the massed succession of events. He does not provide, does not create the succeeding episode—the episode is contrived. The novel is a breathless movie scenario (it actually employs movie gags) of New York's Bohemia; it contains a great deal of excellent prose; it should have a considerable popularity. But since Mr. Dos Passos has limited his sensibility to the diligent registration of appearance and has not proposed an aesthetic problem, you will find that none is solved.

Ernest Hemingway has developed his chief distinction in prose through a careful rejection of "ideas"; he does not conceive his subject matter; he presents it. You will not be able to separate, in his facile accumulation of petites sensations, the observer from the observation, the reporter from the item reported; he never comments in excess of the immediate value of the object as a thing seen, of the event as a focus of observed motions. If he lacks the concept of character, he has an infallible deftness at projecting personality by isolating into typical significance some trivial accident of conduct. He lacks the ostentation of a writer inadequately equipped yet ambitious with a "theory of reality." Most typical of Mr. Hemingway's precise economical method is the story Big Two-Hearted River, where the time is one evening to the next afternoon and the single character a trout fisherman who makes his camp-fire, sleeps all night, gets up and catches a few trout, then starts home; that is all. But the passionate accuracy of particular observation, the intense monosyllabic diction, the fidelity to the internal demands of the subject—these qualities fuse in the

The Authorized Translation. Translated from the Russian by Constance Garnett. In five volumes. Alfred A. Knopf. The first four volumes. $2 each.

In 1923 The Nation reviewed at length another translation of the first two parts of Herzen's great work. The present brilliant version allows the reader to continue with the story of Herzen's marriage; of his last years in Russia; of his father's death; and of his subsequent adventures as propagandist, journalist, and human being in Germany, France, Italy, and England. The book as now seen is not only crammed with incidental wisdom and shrewd observation; it is distinguished as well by its narrative, which in such episodes as the drowning of Herzen's mother and the execution of Emanuel Barthélemy reaches a height of excellence reached elsewhere only by Tolstoi and Aksakov in their autobiographical writings.

Early Poems and Stories. By William Butler Yeats. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The fifth volume in the collected edition of Yeats now soon to be completed. The poems are reprinted with some interesting changes from "The Wanderings of Oisín" (here spelled Usheen) and "The Rose," and the stories from "The Celtic Twilight" and "The Secret Rose." Yeats's passion for revision expresses itself in this volume as in those which have gone before it. When the six are done we shall be in possession of all the verse and prose by which he wishes to stand, and it will be in the form of his preference.

I present the most distinguished as well as the longest list of POETRY I have published in any one season. On it are represented American poets with established reputations, as well as new signers who loom large on our literary horizon.

Puppet and Conductor

I HAVE been haunted by a puppet—a tall, gaunt, straggly haired puppet, clad in a suit of mail. In his hand he bears a sword, drawn ready for use; in his countenance is a lean and hungry look enhanced by a full and exceedingly melancholy eye. Every gesture that he makes springs from an impulse of knightly chivalry, and every gesture, as he makes it, becomes comic. He is, indeed, no other than that immortal champion of knight-errantry, Don Quixote, summoned into being by Remo Bufano for the League of Composers' presentation of "El Retablo de Maese Pedro" ("Master Peter's Puppet Show"). This new opera by the Spanish composer De Falla is based on the inn scene from Cervantes's imperishable satire wherein the inn-keeper's boy, Master Peter, presents for Don Quixote a tale of knight-errantry through the medium of marionettes. As De Falla has conceived his work we see a puppet show within a puppet show—the characters of the first depicted by dolls of the regulation inches, the living characters of the second by dolls of life size. And as the spare figure of the puppet knight moves through his part of spectator, meeting the exigencies of his author's extravagance with undeviating gravity of mien while a singing artist behind the scenes voices his sentiments without disturbing the illusion, I wonder that puppets are not used more as a medium of operatic expression.

Only a few weeks ago I had seen on the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House another great comic character, Sir John Falstaff. The actor was Antonio Scotti—one of the few remaining singing actors who can be called great. He looked the part, he acted the part, he sang the part; and yet there was always some intrusion of voice or personality to remind us that Shakespeare's fat knight was Scotti. Mr. Bufano's lean knight never for one moment swerved from himself. Neither the visible working of his strings by Mr. Bufano, nor the presence of Mr. Mengelberg and Mme Landowska with a small orchestra, nor the singing of the Metropolitan artists could affect him. His sole concern was the tale that was being unfolded before him. Yet even as he shook his head in pity, or brandished his weapon in noble indignation, one laughed. It is, certainly, the very essence of the comic spirit that Mr. Bufano has caught and transfixed in his doll. The immortal Falstaff at the Metropolitan seemed very mortal indeed in the company of his neighbors, whose familiar faces and characteristics no amount of paint, whiskers, or costume could disguise. Watching the puppet Don at the Town Hall, tragic in his absurdity, absurd in his tragedy as he moved in conflict with other pieces of dangling mechanism, one caught that quality of eternity which has kept Cervantes's written masterpiece alive—a quality, too, which no living actor can give. With Mr. Scotti and his colleagues I took refuge in the music. With the marionettes I forgot all about it. And if I thought about it at any time it was to wish that the league had spent less money on the orchestra and more for expert puppeteers to work these masterly portrait dolls.

It was Leopold Stokowski, I believe, who in speaking some years ago of conductors in general and of Toscanini in particular said: "We are all schoolboys next to him." Since then, of course, Mr. Stokowski, as well as a few of his colleagues, has grown far beyond that callow age. Nevertheless, without any desire to underestimate either his or their abilities, one may be pardoned, perhaps, for still proclaiming Toscanini as the master. Other conductors come and go, leaving a trail of "interpretations" in their wake to be used afterward as a basis of comparison. With Toscanini there is no basis of comparison. One may listen to a Bodanzky floundering about in Bach, and wonder why he should be called a "Friend of Music"; or to a Goossens struggling with the "Rites of Spring" against an unyielding orchestra, and recall a happier occasion when this same conductor led another orchestra through this same work and the "Rites" themselves seemed more like the primal frenzy of creation, as conceived by Stravinsky, and less like the birth of a turnip, as conceived by the New York Symphony; or, again, one may listen to even a Stokowski riding his cheval de bataille, "Scheherazade," and yet let one's thoughts as well as one's eyes dwell on the changing blocks of color thrown on a screen by the clavilux, speculating, even as these blocks interpret the music, on the possibilities of such a fluidity of light, design, and motive as a background for ballet or pantomime. But when Toscanini conducts, one's thoughts do not go venturing. One does not care whether Abert's arrangement of Bach is good or bad, because one is hearing Bach himself in the fulness of his glory; or whether Toscanini brings out of the "Pines of Rome" more than Respighi has put in, because what Toscanini brings out is supremely beautiful. Even the tradition-ridden "Fifth" of Beethoven and the threadbare show-piece of a Scherzo from Mendelssohn's setting to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" take on the freshness of new birth in the clarifying fire of Toscanini's genius. As for the Philharmonic Orchestra, never has it displayed such a golden quality of tone, such unity of attack and purpose, such complete and exquisite responsiveness to the will of one man. And if it took a Toscanini to draw out these perfections in the Philharmonic, it also took the Philharmonic, it seems, to reveal all the perfections in Toscanini's conducting.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

Drama

The Tragedy of Masks

REDUCED to its simplest terms the theme of Eugene O'Neill's latest play is familiar enough. "The Great God Brown" (Greenwich Village Theater) is the story of an artist turned wastrel and cynic in an effort to hide the pain of his frustration, and the story of his relations with a boyhood friend who chose the path which promised to lead to safety and success. Yet it differs from the usual treatments of similar themes not only because it is cast in a highly fantastic form but also by virtue of the fact that it is no complacent satire on philistinism but a passionate attempt to expound the mystery of the artist's maladjustment and of that perpetual tendency of his to slide into the mud while aspiring toward the stars. Its hero, one who had "got paint on his paws in an endeavor to see God," blunders through life, torturing and tortured; he wears a mask because those who see his face are afraid and he turns cynic because "When Pan was forbidden the light and warmth of the sun he grew sensitive and self-conscious and proud and revengeful—and became Prince of Darkness." Yet even he cannot call his life good unless, in the Nietzschean phrase, life is good because it is painful. "I've loved, lusted, won and lost, sang and wept!"—so much he can claim. But his designs are blasphemies and his heart a maelstrom. Unhappy himself, he has been the cause of unhappiness in others, and when he dies he knows no more than that he has lived. He can taunt others with their impotence and he can flaunt his passion in their startled faces, but he cannot explain what his potency has availed him. He has not seen the face of either God or Devil clearly enough to know which was which, and it is with curses that he has uttered the sincerest of his prayers.

At no time during the course of his career has Mr. O'Neill given us a play more powerful or more confused than this. Never before has he dealt with a passion so nakedly personal, and never before has he allowed the chaos within to shatter so completely the form of the drama. To his characters he gives masks which from time to time they put on when self-revelation is too painful to themselves or others, but to himself he allows none; and the thirteen scenes of his play are thirteen dancing stars still molten and fluid like the chaos from which they sprung. They are moments in the life of a man described in a brilliantly poetic sentence as one who "had looked into his own dark and was afraid"; and they are thus, it is difficult not to believe, fragmentary confessions from that dramatist who has peered more intently than any of his countrymen at the fantastic shadows cast by reality upon the walls of the dark cavern which is the self. Essentially it is a tragedy of masks, the story of a group of people who even in their most intimate moments cannot bear to gaze for more than a few seconds at the naked faces of their companions; but for Mr. O'Neill it is an unmasking and an unmasking become tragic for the reason that the play itself makes clear. Bare himself as he will, we cannot see all that he would have us see; strip off one mask and there remains, or seems to remain, only another beneath it. We look at one another but we do not see; we talk but we do not communicate. And in the end we do what the wife does at the end of the play. She having lived all her life with a mask, takes it when her husband is dead and, all unaware that it is not he at all, promises with devastating irony that it shall live forever in her heart.

Whatever of confusion remains in the play must be inherent in the work itself, for the present production, directed by Robert Edmond Jones, is admirably acted and conceived with a remarkably complete grasp of the possibilities which the script affords. Not only the handling of masks but all the technical difficulties which production raised have been solved with great skill, and the play is, I believe, bodied forth upon the stage in as complete and satisfactory a manner as is humanly possible. If the effect remains more powerful than clear, more intense than illuminating, that is the result of the immediacy of the material with which the author is dealing. He is himself too close to the passions with which he is dealing to objectify them completely, and they master him quite as often as he is able to master them. Here, in a word, are passions as authentic and as burning as any that ever went into literature, but no one could say that they had been "recollected in tranquillity." In these parts are summed up the beauties and the defects of the play.

"The Makropoulos Secret" (Charles Hopkins's Theater) is a play, more ingenious than profound, by Karel Capek. It deals in an entertaining manner with a woman who possessed the secret of eternal life and it points, after the manner of the author, the moral of the fable. A group of men, having possessed themselves of the magic formula, conclude (as it may be remembered Leopardi concluded before them) that the secret of longevity is of little value in the absence of the secret of happiness, and they accordingly burn the parchment upon which the formula is written. The piece is well acted by Heler Menken and Ullrich Haupt.

ADVOCATES OF PROHIBITION have been thrown into a flutter by the announcement that the Church Temperance Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church is in favor of a modification of the Volstead act. The declaration has probably been taken rather too seriously. Its import, or even its authenticity, is decidedly open to question until we know the size and character of the organization, how the referendum was taken, and the figures in the vote. Of twenty-three bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church who responded to an inquiry by the New York Times only five indorsed the stand of the Church Temperance Society. Nevertheless, it is not without interest that a church society, the active head of which was formerly superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York State, should be lined up in opposition to the present prohibition movement. There is weight, too, in the argument put forward by the society that educational work in behalf of temperance was practically dropped with the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment and all reliance has since been placed in the strong arm of the law, a means which has so far proved incapable of meeting the situation.

OF MORE SIGNIFICANCE to the future of liquor control than the declaration of the Church Temperance Society were remarks made recently before a gathering of ministers by Lincoln C. Andrews, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of enforcing prohibition, and by Emory R. Buckner, United States Attorney in charge of federal prosecutions in New York City. Both men took the stand that the United States Government had not been and would not be able to enforce prohibition; it did not and could not provide enough enforcement officers or courts for the work; the various States would have to pass laws and set up machinery to carry out the Eighteenth Amendment. Now this statement, if true, is immensely more important than Messrs. Andrews and Buckner and the ministers who listened to them seemed to realize. For it would mean the abandonment of national prohibition in favor of local option. If the federal government cannot carry out its own law in regions where it is unpopular, it is certain that no individual State can or will try to. If prohibition is left to the States, it will be treated as local sentiment dictates; as a national measure it will cease to exist.

AMONG THE MANY BY-PRODUCTS of America's benevolent imperialism in the Philippine Islands is one of which we seldom boast—a small matter of 2,500 casual offspring of the unions of American soldiers and Filipino girls. We do not boast about them, but neither can we any longer ignore them, for, according to an appeal recently issued by Governor General Leonard Wood, these children "have been either abandoned or . . . are growing up in pernicious surroundings." General Wood wants to raise $15,000 a year by popular subscription to support and educate the children so that they may "be converted into citizens who will be a credit to their fathers' race." That may seem, in the face of the facts, a rather ironical hope, but we have no reason to doubt the serious condition of these unwanted and untended children. Certainly they should be educated and given a chance to develop into normal human beings. And, quite as certainly, the responsibility for this task should fall primarily on the army. If good roads and sanitation are products of American occupation of the islands, no less are these hordes of children. They are the children of America's policy in the Philippines, the children of the army. A public campaign for funds, however successful it may be, will not lift responsibility from the Government of the United States. A sum of money should be taken from the appropriations for national defense for the care of these children of America's soldiers. It should be an annual charge upon the military.

WHEN THE UNITED STATES sets out to spread the blessings of a stable government of law in the Caribbean it inculcates the idea first by violating whatever native law it finds irksome and then by overriding such law as it imposes when that legislation proves to be inconvenient. In our issue of December 16 we noted that soon after American troops invaded the republic of Haiti and gradually took over the government, a new constitution was forced upon the country, which presumably was to our liking since it was written by Franklin D. Roosevelt, then Assistant Secretary of the Navy. This provided for the election of a legislature every other year and for the election of a President by the legislature every fourth year. A legislature to choose a successor to the American-made President, Louis Borno, should have been elected on January 10 last. The election did not take place. The American Occupation resorted to the simple but effective expedient of prohibiting it. More than that, when Windsor Bellegarde, one of the candidates, showed himself in public on the afternoon of January 10 and was called upon for a speech, he was forcibly pulled off the rostrum by Lieutenant Beal of our Marine Corps, while others in the crowd were beaten, one so severely that he had to be sent to a hospital for medical attention.

FOR BETTER OR WORSE the United States enters the World Court. The reservations render it most unlikely that we shall make any effective use of our privileges of membership, but they do not accomplish what The Nation most insistently demanded—the elimination of war in the enforcement of the Court's decisions. In the midst of the final struggle Senator Moses made a valiant effort to push this consideration to the front by offering a reservation:

That the adherence of the United States to the statute of the World Court is conditioned upon the understanding and agreement that the judgments, decrees, and (or) advisory opinions of the Court shall not be enforced by war under any name or in any form whatever.

In the debate the advocates of the Court showed themselves sorry friends of peace. They opposed the Moses reservation on dubious grounds: that the League could not repudiate force—force being the basis of its authority; that such a reservation would merely have the effect of keeping the United States out of the Court. If the friends of the Court are right, our worst fears about that body are amply justified. We cannot share in the decisions of the Court without assuming active responsibility for the system of sanctions that underlies them.

WE STILL BELIEVE, however, that the friends of the Court are wrong in the position they take; their cause need not be as vicious as they would make it appear. We believe with Senator Borah that the nations adhering to the World Court could agree among themselves that the judgments of the Court shall not be executed by means of force. If such an agreement should require an amendment to the Covenant of the League it would be the greatest improvement the League could institute. The friends of the Court had enough votes so that they could afford to be incautious in their arguments. They cheerfully gave their case away by first asserting that public opinion would sustain the decisions of the Court and then admitting that the use of force might be "the only way" to enforce a judgment against a recalcitrant nation. They gave their case away—but they won it none the less. We are grateful at least to Senator Moses and Senator Borah, who so ably supported the only reservation that could possibly turn the World Court into an instrument of peace.

ON TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, Mr. Coolidge denounced Congress for its increasing attacks upon him, characterizing them as "seasonal, or actuated by political motives." He asserted that the Government was proceeding in an orderly fashion to investigate all cases of law infringement and declared that our entrance into the World Court did not foreshadow entrance into the League of Nations—which latter statement makes us expect that he will urge our entrance into the League within the next twelve months. One good thing followed. Senators Wheeler and Harrison tore aside the mask the President tries to hide behind at his semi-weekly conference with the newspaper men and replied directly and openly to the President's attack. Presto, change! Three days later the President sang a different tune. At his second weekly interview with the newspaper men he was deeply "appreciative of the legislative record of Congress in dealing with America's adherence to the Permanent Court of International Justice and the revision of taxes." The correspondents explained that the President was not entirely a critic and that he was anxious to give praise where he thought it was deserving. How it must hurt him to utter a word in criticism and how eager he is to have the public understand that he chastises Congress, as any fond father does his offspring, merely for Congress's own good! Curiously enough, however, the barrage upon the President has not decreased but rather increased. Hence, no doubt, the Department of Justice's quick move against the food trusts which contrasts so remarkably with its months and months of delay in moving against Mr. Mellon's aluminum company.

THE OLDEST and most important question in the world is, When do we eat? Our captains of industry have been somewhat remiss heretofore in giving due weight to this fundamental situation. There are signs, however, that they propose to do better. On the heels of Mr. Ward's two-billion-dollar bread combine and in spite of the suit that has been begun against it by the federal government, comes an announcement from Wall Street that it is about to give its blessing to the National Food Products Corporation, "the first great holding company empowered to invest in food concerns." Already the new corporation has acquired interests in 2,000 chain stores in twenty States, as well as in ice-cream and dairy companies. That it is a 1926 model is attested by the fact that it is issuing 1,000,000 shares of Class A common stock and 1,000,000 shares of Class B common stock—both without par value. With the appearance of the alphabet, it is always a safe bet that the investing public is going to pay the cost of the physical properties acquired and have no tangible control—often not even a legal vote—in their future management, while the insiders who promote the combine pay nothing, are awarded a few shares of Class C stock, and run the works in perpetuity. And what could be a happier choice to run in perpetuity than a nation's food?

ANOTHER KLANNISH ORGANIZATION has been born in Georgia. It arrived on a quiet Sunday in Atlanta, January 17, and was named the Supreme Kingdom. Its friends say that the Supreme Kingdom will devote itself to the modest program of a world-wide campaign against evolution. It plans organizations all over the United States and bureaus in Great Britain, Canada, and Australia, but the headquarters will remain in Atlanta. Within four days of the official birth of the Supreme Kingdom $100,000 was subscribed to the fund for the proposed Bryan Memorial University at Dayton, Tennessee, and it was said that a subscription of $50,000,000 would be sought. What justifies us chiefly in describing this new organization as Klannish is the fact that Edward Young Clark of Atlanta, former Klan leader, was appointed as its head and Roscoe Carpenter of Indianapolis was made "organizer extraordinary." The Ku Klux Klan itself is about done; its novelty and nightgowns are worn out. But the soil in which it thrived remains. There may be as much money and publicity for the organizers of a campaign against evolution as in baiting Catholics, Jews, and Negroes. There are always new worlds of ignorance and superstition to conquer.

A NOTABLE EXPERIMENT in cooperation between organized labor and college students is going on at the University of Denver. Student window cleaners, employed by the Student Window Cleaner Company owned by Rose Brothers, had been working in Denver as non-union men. While the wages for skilled students equaled the union scale, the pay for apprentices was slightly lower. The window-cleaners' union protested that students were undermining their wages and throwing them out of work, and the local federation of labor carried the protest to the chancellor of Denver University. The chancellor, who has been known as a friend of organized labor, called upon the parties to discuss their differences. Through the mediation of a Y. M. C. A. secretary, a professor, and a labor editor the students, employers, and union leaders worked out an agreement. All the student window cleaners joined the union. Skilled students will receive at least as much as the union scale, which is almost seventy cents an hour. The union will not object to student apprentices provided the scale paid to them is set by arbitration and provided an arbitration committee also determines when the employers shall bring in new men instead of employing veteran window cleaners in Denver who are unemployed. Thus there is promise that the two great barriers between student participation in organized labor movements, the apprenticeship rules and employment preference, will disappear.

SEVENTEEN TO SEVEN. Nothing that may be imagined concerning those figures in juxtaposition could seem quite so grotesque as the fact that they stand for the vote of the Liberals in Parliament for and against Lloyd George as leader of their poor little remnant in the House. In a recent interview Lloyd George said that the reason why reaction was enthroned in present-day governments was that since the war the progressive parties and leaders had been fighting among themselves. Think of it! In November, 1918, Lloyd George was altogether certain of gaining such a majority at the polls as would have given him a government powerful enough to secure the kind of settlement demanded by all the decent elements in Britain and America. He preferred to make his appeal to the mob, drunk with victory, and to drive from Parliament those Liberals and Labor men who had striven to check his own madness and to make possible a peace of healing and reason. Inevitably, therefore, in the hour of his fall in 1922 he had no party to lead, and today, four years after the Tories threw him over, the net result of his efforts to recover a position of leadership is a bitter conflict among the distracted Liberals and a parliamentary vote of 17 to 7.

OUTSIDE THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, the wrangle over Lloyd George is the most humiliating affair that has occurred in British party politics for at least half a century. Mr. George has accumulated a campaign fund of at least $5,000,000. It is wholly under his own control. Its origin has never been explained, and its possessor lives in fear of a call in Parliament or the press for a public investigation. The Liberal campaign chest is empty, and Lloyd George says to the directors of the party machine: Put your organization behind my new land scheme, which we all know you doubt or detest, and the fund is at your disposal. To which the Asquith Liberals reply, with a simplicity that to the American politician may seem a good deal less than credible: We want your money, but we don't want you.

A CHINESE STUDENT learns his school lessons at the top of his lungs, surrounded by others shouting equally loudly; a coolie accomplishes some work in a mob of fellow-coolies all crying out to do different things at different times; and a Chinese hotel is a never-ceasing babel of altercation, ribald song, and uproarious conversation. Yet somehow China produces great scholars, performs amazing feats of mass labor without the aid of horse or motor, and presumably Chinese travelers manage to get some sleep. And in the midst of civil war the Chinese post office continues to grow and to spread its branches into the remotest corners of the territories of all the dozens of tuchuns and supertuchuns who seem to divide the republic into a score of warring parts. The figures for 1924, recently compiled, show that the total pieces of mail carried in that year of civil wars was 522,352,095—a gain of 50,000,000 pieces over the 1923 figure. One interesting commentary upon the processes at work in China behind the much-advertised civil wars is that 97,000,000 newspapers and magazines were carried in 1924, as compared with 81,000,000 in 1923 and hardly 1,000,000 ten years ago. China is learning to read! Another interesting reflection for those who think the Chinese an incapable race is the fact that the Chinese postal staff, with all its foreign business, includes 35,590 Chinese and only 121 foreigners.

BEN FOSTER is dead. For years he lived and painted among the Litchfield hills and seemed as exempt from time's decay as the rubble of boulders deposited by the glacial drift. He was not a visionary, for men are not visionaries who grow old among the hills where the earth is stubborn to the plow and life is hard. But Ben Foster in his pictures took little account of the human midges that labor upon the rocky soil; he contemplated the forested hills as one whose mind harked far back into geologic time. He was as familiar as the spirit of earth with the forces that had molded the valleys and driven the foundations of the mountains. And there was given to him the power to translate through plastic means the terrific substance of things—his trees have roots that search deep; their trunks are ponderable almost beyond the reach of ordinary tricks of light and shade. He was interested in a tree for the way it felt under the palms of his hands. And how he loved rocks and their lichen surfaces! He must have sensed the immense patience of a rock enduring the erosion of the ages. Into his landscapes he has infused no fiery moods and few lyrical ones. He was impelled to render natural objects as he honestly saw them under conditions which made them seem beautiful to man; but this pageant of beauty is not created for man. Nature is a lonely god playing idly with the sunlight and moonlight, unconscious of man and man's destiny.

Raiding Water-Power

SIDE by side on the international bridge crossing the Niagara River stand two electric lamps. To the one on the north, current is supplied by the government-owned power system of the province of Ontario. It costs $8 a year. To the one on the south, current is supplied by a private American power company. It costs $43 a year. A storekeeper in Galt, Ontario, pays $7.82 for 412 kilowatts—a month's supply of current. In San Jose, California, 412 kilowatts for a storekeeper cost $25.44; in Washington, D. C., $27.33; in New York City, $20.60. In 1912 the people of London, Ontario, were paying a private company 9 cents a kilowatt. In 1921 they were paying the government 1.9 cents a kilowatt. The cost of lighting the Labor Temple in Galt, Ontario, for five months in 1911 was $467.91; for the same five months in 1922, $179.94. Meanwhile the average domestic rate in the United States is about 10 cents a kilowatt. The State of New York, with its boundaries on Niagara, as are those of Ontario, pays at least twice the Ontario rate.

The United States Geological Survey has, in Professional Paper 125, mapped out a superpower system for the region between Boston and Washington, including of course New York State. The plan contemplates a main transmission line running between the two cities, into which will feed all isolated power units, now run independently and wastefully. The plan could be installed in ten years' time (Ontario took about as long) and would save:

For electric utilities	19 million tons of coal a year
For railroads	10 million tons of coal a year
For manufacturers	21 million tons of coal a year
A total of	50 million tons of coal a year

Charles P. Steinmetz, perhaps the greatest electrical engineer America has produced, analyzed the New York power situation shortly before he died. He found 50,000 industrial plants using 5,000,000 horse-power, of which only 1,300,000 came from water-power—the balance coming from coal and requiring the shipment into New York of 25,000,000 tons a year. Meanwhile coal fired locomotives consume 12,000,000 tons more. He found that the State has readily available 4,200,000 horse-power of energy to be derived from falling water in addition to the 1,300,000 already developed; and another 4,000,000 could be made available by storage. One horse power of energy is the equivalent of ten tons of coal a year. Thus the 4,200,000 horse-power readily available could save 42,000,000 tons of coal a year and more than supply all present industrial and railroad needs (37,000,000 tons). Such a project would save, further, 500 locomotives (electric locomotives are more efficient than steam) and 15,000 coal cars; it would increase the capacity of the railroads by relieving congestions; lower the cost of energy; save the State $140,000,000 a year; and give us smoke-free cities.

E. F. Slosson has estimated that there are 5,000,000 horse-power now running to waste in the Niagara region—the equivalent of 350,000 loaves of bread or 600,000 fresh eggs per hour. Messrs. Gilbert and Pogue, late of the Geological Survey, have worked out a chart showing the gigantic potentiality of savings in energy and in natural resources which an articulation of water-power, coal, oil, and natural gas, on a nation-wide scale, could bring about for the United States.

So when Governor Smith stands up in Albany and questions the moral right of a Republican commission to give away 2,000,000 of the State's horse-power for a term of fifty years we will do well to bear the above facts in mind. This amount of water-power will go to private companies and comprises potential energy on the Niagara and St. Lawrence Rivers, energy now owned by the people of New York State. And, as Governor Smith has pointed out, it is the last of the State's possessions in natural resources. Everything but water-power has gone into private hands. The claimants for this last citadel of empire are, among others, the Northeastern Power Corporation, a giant holding company, and the St. Lawrence Valley Power Company, controlled by the aluminum trust. Is either of these two private organizations interested in cheapening power to the people of New York; will they be content to light lamps on the international bridge for $8 a year; or coordinate—which means subordinate—their properties with any regional or nation-wide giant-power projects; or care about the elimination of waste except in so far as it affects their own balance sheets?

Not unless this holding company and this aluminum trust are different from any other private corporation ever heard of. They will play the normal, modern business game; they have, indeed, no other choice. They will issue securities—probably a whole alphabetical series of these up-to-the-minute non-voting common stocks; they will include in their valuations an enormous account for "organization expenses," and they will, like the New York Telephone Company, employ every means in their power—including the employment of swarms of engineers, appraisers, certified public accountants, and real-estate experts—to fix the valuations of their physical assets at an amount which will give them a maximum return under whatever State regulation of rates may be imposed. They will be forever in the courts, while batteries of the nation's most astute legal talent will be carrying one appeal after another up to the supreme bench. They will fight both directly through their unparalleled avenues of publicity, and indirectly through their friendly acquaintance in the legislature, every attempt the State may make to stiffen or improve its regulation, and nine times out of ten they will defeat such improvement. They will gradually create a margin between their ostensible and their real earnings, which in due course will take on all the sanctity of a vested interest, and this—when the fifty-year leasehold is up—the State will pay for through the nose before the private companies can be induced to withdraw. They will, if the history of private public utilities in these States be any guide at all, keep costs at the maximum which can be wrung from the public or a pliant legislature, emerge through the means of subsidiary companies every nickel saved by technical improvement, and block, except at a huge tribute, every project for giant power which has as its aim the welfare of the whole community.

Every citizen who cares one iota for New York State and its future development is behind Governor Smith in his fight.

Mussolini Menaces Europe

A MENACE to Europe—that is what Mussolini has become. We cannot recall in recent years, perhaps not since the Kaiser's telegram to President Kruger, any utterance by a supposedly responsible European statesman which for downright mischief-making can compare with the attack upon Germany made by Mussolini in the Chamber of Deputies in Rome on February 6. Denouncing the German campaign on behalf of the submerged Tyrol as "nefarious, ridiculous, and lying," the Prime Minister went on to say:

We will be sufficiently explicit—and I believe that plain-speaking will serve truth, civilization, and even peace—to alter slightly the old formula and declare that sometimes it is necessary to pay with two eyes for the loss of one and with a whole set of teeth for the loss of one tooth. . . . I hope my speech will be understood by those who should understand it, so that the Italian Government need not pass a concrete answer as it would if tomorrow the German Government assumed direct responsibility for what is happening and what may happen in Germany.

Referring then to the Locarno spirit of which Europe has been so proud, he ridiculed it as being something "soft, evanescent, insupportable, and even hypocritical like habitual things."

Throughout Italy the fascist press and the chief political leaders have accepted this as practically a declaration of war against Germany—against an unarmed and defenseless Germany. That means, furthermore, a threat against the League of Nations itself, precisely as he defied it when he went to the Island of Corfu and killed defenseless children by his unprovoked and indefensible bombardment of that island.

What, we ask, would have been the reaction of Europe had the Kaiser made an utterance like this? Here we have the threat to conquer additional territory because Mussolini does not like the campaign that is being waged openly and fairly to undo one of the most terrible mistakes of the Treaty of Versailles—the cession of the Tyrol to Italy. As a matter of fact the Kaiser's telegram to Kruger was of little significance compared to this, for the agitation for the freedom of the Tyrol is bound to go on. If Mussolini cows Germany and Austria by his threats of war, then the agitation will go on in Switzerland, in England, in France, in the United States, wherever there are men and women who believe in justice and humanity and fair dealing, and are opposed to the abominable outraging of innocent people at the hands of foreign despots.

Americans do not realize, in the first place, that the guilt is largely upon our own heads, for it was Woodrow Wilson at Paris who, betraying every American principle for which he stood and particularly that of the right of this racial group to self-determination, turned over the Tyrol to Italy. In the next place Americans do not realize that all Europe is in fear of the aggression of Mussolini. Fascist leaders, drunk with unrestrained power, talk of war with France and vow they can whip her; Switzerland trembles for fear that the widespread fascist propaganda to wrest from her her Italian cantons will turn into action; in Albania, in Yugoslavia, in Greece they fear the dictator of Rome. It is Mussolini who has become the mad dog of Europe, and those Americans like our bankers who think that we must approve this sort of government of Italy, who pat the dictator on the back and say that it is the duty of liberalism to let Italy have the kind of government it wants, must realize that if this sort of thing goes on the peace of Europe will be in jeopardy as it never was jeopardized by the stupid fumbler of Potsdam.

What would we have America do in the premises? We would have her do nothing more and nothing less than she has always done, let the world know where her sympathy lies, that it is with the oppressed of the Tyrol precisely as it was with the Boers in their war with England, precisely as it went out to the Irish and the Greeks in their fight for freedom, precisely as it was on the side of Garibaldi and Mazzini and Cavour in their battle to free Italy from Austrian tyranny. This, of course, does not mean a threat of war, but it does mean that we shall make felt the weight of our moral indignation against not only what is happening in the Tyrol, but against the Mussolini menace to all Europe.

In the New York Evening Post Dorothy Thompson, one of the best of our American correspondents abroad, has been setting forth what has been happening in the Tyrol. It is a record of deliberate and systematic tyranny. Mussolini may deny as he pleases the charges made in the German press; they have been made in the English press and in the American press, wherever the press is free. He cannot deny that he has destroyed all the village councils; that he has violated the sacred pledges made by the King of Italy himself that the German schools would not be interfered with; that every Germanic newspaper has been suppressed. Nothing in our judgment could have been much worse than the methods the Italians have adopted to compel every German to become an Italian. It has been an outrage which has cried to high heaven.

Monuments and Monuments

NOW it is a great memorial for William Jennings Bryan which is being planned for Washington. It is to be a common or park by which his admirers desire to commemorate the Commoner and the defender of that faith which denies alike reason and science. As yet the money is not raised, nor has the plan been worked out in detail; but in general it is to be a public meeting and recreation place surrounded by impressive edifices—belonging, perhaps, if the Bible stories see their way clear, to universities which are to be dedicated to stopping the hands of time and the wheel of progress. The Common is to cost $1,000,000 and there will be a "central chimes tower."

This ambitious undertaking may or may not come to pass. But the mere prospect of it is sufficient to bring up the question of the attitude of Congress toward such commemorative projects. We have already referred to the Roosevelt memorial, to the extraordinary beauty of the design, and what seems to us its extraordinary adaptation to the site the projectors have selected for it. But its very beauty brings up the question as to whether Congress should give to the donors the desired site and whether it should or should not pass upon the memorial itself. Ought Congress to consider the question of the public services of Mr. Roosevelt before granting permission for a work which in some respects will dwarf the Lincoln Memorial and make the Washington Monument seem utterly inadequate for the Father of His Country; or should it jump to receive a gift so valuable and so artistic? Undoubtedly the proposal will fit in well with the Burnham plan for the development of Washington to which the Bryan common would also have to conform. But if the proposed Roosevelt site is preempted there will be no further opportunity to place a great memorial in that section of Washington. Even the most ardent admirer of Colonel Roosevelt will, we think, hardly contend that his services to the country equal those of Lincoln and Washington. Indeed, his achievements in the field of legislation are being wiped out almost at the rate of one a month by Mr. Coolidge's devitalizing appointments. Few will concede that Mr. Bryan's services warrant the distinction of a great public square. But will Congress refuse the offer?

The problem is not merely a theoretical one, for the Woodrow Wilson memorial will be along soon—it is only by the uncommon kindness of Providence that the $800,000 tomb of Warren G. Harding is to be hidden in Marion, Ohio—and doubtless Wall Street will some day desire, as it should, to erect the tallest memorial edifice in the world to Calvin Coolidge. What complicates the question is not merely the artistic or utilitarian character of each memorial contemplated; it is the issue as to the value of the public man in question. Can Congress pass upon such an issue? If not, should it appoint a committee of standards? And if the latter, how shall it be constituted? By assigning to it ardent admirers of Roosevelt, or Wilson, or Bryan, or Harding? Should there be critics of these and other statesmen on it? Shall conservatives and liberals and radicals all be represented on such a body? In other words, can any group be found to pass the judgment of history upon conspicuous political figures?

For ourselves, we find most of these questions unanswerable. But we have one concrete suggestion to make: let Congress pass a law forbidding any great memorial to a man dead less than fifty years. The capital waited longer than that for the Lincoln Memorial. The Washington Monument was begun in 1848 but not finished until 1884. To rush to commemorate statesmen in bronze and stone and marble immediately after their death is characteristic of our nervous age. In the case of Mr. Harding the haste was necessary; the $800,000 could not have been raised today, we believe, in the light of facts as to the crooked and disgraceful character of his administration which have come out. A sentimental Congress might in 1922 have permitted a monument to Mr. Harding it would now regret.

Let anyone go to Washington and see for himself how the city is cluttered with equestrian statues (on the most amazing equines conceived in the mind of man) and civilian statues of unknown worthies carved apparently by the hands of gravestone "artists." It is enough to make one wish that an earthquake could obliterate all but a few. Now, however, in our richer age we do not think a statue, afoot or on horseback, adequate for a modern Daniel Webster or Lewis Cass. We want a $3,000,000 water-side structure, or an $800,000 mausoleum, or a $2,000,000 park. Our tributes in bronze and stone grow in size in proportion to our national wealth and grandeur—only critical faculty is lacking. So at least let us ask Congress for a law which will save Washington from memorials for fifty years. By that time a public man will be evaluated not by passionate friends and ardent admirers but in the light of a succeeding generation which will be sufficiently detached to see whether a man's contemporary greatness has lasted; whether his achievements have or have not been wiped out by his successors or have contributed something worth while to our nation's progress; whether his visions of a new and better world have stood the test of time.

Jazzing the Scriptures

TO the mind which is ignorant of advertising and its wonders nothing could seem more dead from a commercial standpoint than the Apocryphal Scriptures. Who, one might ask, could be persuaded to read "The Visions of the Shepherd Hermas," which lost its popularity a great many centuries ago, and who among the movie-going public would care to buy the so-called "Letters of Pontius Pilate," which purport to give an account of the Resurrection? And yet a publisher of the sign-this-coupon, sent-on-approval variety has undertaken to sell just these things; and it is not at all unlikely that he will succeed, for though no one is interested in the Apocryphal Scriptures there are doubtless a good many credulous souls who are panting for them if they are called "The Lost Books of the Bible" and are anxious to see Pilate "The Arch-Coward of History Revealed in His Own Words."

For the small sum of $2.95 (plus a few cents postage) one can receive C. O. D. not only the works described but in addition other books which contain "detailed accounts of some of the most interesting events of the Bible that are hardly mentioned at all in the New Testament." There are "The Gospel of Mary," which "gives a fuller account than we have in any other place of the girlhood of Mary"; "The Gospel of the Protoevangelion," which "gives a wonderfully detailed account of the birth of Jesus"; and "The Gospel of the Infancy," which has "twenty-two remarkable chapters telling of the boyhood and school days of Jesus."

If this book should happen to receive any considerable circulation we predict some unhappy hours for a good many pastors scattered over these United States. The authority of the Bible has long depended to a very considerable extent upon its fixed form. To the vast majority of Christians it is a unified whole of which it may be said that whatever is there is true and whatever is not there is not true. Questions of canonicity, of the formation of the book, and of the reasons for the inclusion of this or the exclusion of that are outside the ken of most believers, whose attitude is largely that of the revivalist who is said to have declared that the King James Bible was good enough for the Apostles and therefore good enough for him. Either the village atheist or the too-ready believer who happened to be armed with these "Lost Books" could ask questions to which the best-informed theologian could not give wholly satisfactory answers. For even though every word of the Bible be literally true there remains the question, What is the Bible?

At the Dayton trial one of the parties most interested in the prosecution expressed privately his surprise at hearing it stated that there was more than one Bible. He had "never heard tell" of any besides the one with which he was familiar, and he sensed dimly the problem which was involved. The court in its wisdom decided that no information upon this or any other subject was permissible in spite of the fact that it was, historically, the very subject which did most to undermine a belief in the literal trustworthiness of the Scriptures. Now, jazz has a way of penetrating a good deal further than scholarship, and it may very well happen that the advertiser to whom this editorial is dedicated will, all unknowingly, do more for the cause of liberalism in theology than all the experts who offered their services at Dayton.

The Universe, Inc. By H. v. L.

OUR DISTINGUISHED CONTEMPORARY the Forum has established the amount of noise per nerve which must be endured by the average New Yorker.

The Nation, ALWAYS IN THE VANGUARD of local and national patriotism, decided to do something about the dirt of the metropolis. Your favorite weekly, therefore, at enormous expense sent for Professor Dr. Schmutzmesser, the well known specialist of the University of Pittsburgh.

WITH THE HELP of a simple celluloid collar he found that the amount of soft-coal dust per square inch of lung in Greater New York surpasses by 600 per cent the record established in 1867 by the London underground.

THE STORY OF THE ROOSEVELT and her crew and her captain and their quiet heroism somehow or other made us feel that the rest of the newspaper could not be quite true.

FURTHERMORE WE WERE MADE HAPPY by the news that Art Young is working on a new type of devil and that the Paris Stock Exchange intends to erect a memorial to France's Unknown Creditor.

Tampa—Florida's Big City

By CHESTER C. PLATT

TAMPA—Florida's big city; big ships in the harbor; big cigar factories; big skyscrapers; big municipal hotel; big phosphate mines, and big orange groves surrounding the city; big man-made sand islands in the bay (homes for its millionaires); big subdivisions all around; big bridge, six miles long, connecting the city with St. Petersburg; big growth of 90 per cent in population in five years (Jacksonville, 95,000; Tampa, 94,000; Miami, 71,000); big automobile traffic jams; big newspapers with ninety or 100 pages Sunday and forty or fifty pages on week days; big ditches to drain the surrounding swamps; big tourist camps in suburbs; big cranes and sand-sucking machines; big millionaires; big cock fights sponsored by the millionaires; and also one big bull fight, but the exhibition was indorsed by the head of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

Tampa—Florida's dirtiest city; debris from torn-down buildings everywhere, old brick, plaster, and lath; new building material of all kinds piled high in the streets and on vacant lots. The old county courthouse is a veritable monument to filth. Nobody can visit it without contempt of court. There is much rubbish in the courthouse park, the tourists' principal loafing-place and sun-bath resort. A rusty wire entanglement fastened to old gas-pipe posts surrounds it. An ineffectual appreciation of the sorry look of things is shown by several signs, which say: "All well-bred people will throw their orange peel, waste paper, and peanut shells in the trash can."

Yet, only three or four blocks away is Tampa's municipally owned resort, the Tampa Bay Hotel, a veritable Moorish palace, with spacious verandas, a stately façade showing arches and pinnacles like those of Seville, surrounded by a park (named after Henry B. Plant) fragrant with tropical flowers and vines, shaded with fronded palms and live-oaks, and bounded on one side by the placid Hillsboro River.

The story goes that when the hotel was opened Mr. Plant, Florida's great West Coast developer, sent a special invitation to Henry B. Flagler, Florida's great East Coast developer, to come to the celebration.

"Where is Tampa?" telegraphed Mr. Flagler. "Follow the crowd," answered Mr. Plant.

A polyglot city is Tampa. One suburb is known as Ybor City (pronounced E-bo). Here Spanish is spoken, and here more Havana cigars are made every year than are produced in Cuba. One firm makes the proud boast that by a "royal warrant signed by Alphonso" it makes cigars for the King of Spain. But they are non-union cigars, as the unsanitary and poverty-stricken appearance of Ybor City testifies. The more often one visits Ybor the more one feels like smoking other cigars.

It was at Ybor City that the bull fight was held by the Cuban Club. There was a drove of real bulls from Texas, and real matadors from Spain (Rafael Gomez called "El Gallo" and Francisco Perez Rivera) dressed in gold and silver-braided vests and knee-breeches. Across their shoulders jauntily hung the red "capa," to enrage the bulls.

There were real señoritas there, who draped hundreds of gay-colored mantillas around the railing of the bull ring and, as they did so, there were cheers upon cheers from 5,000 spectators.

Señorita Pilar Conde, noted Spanish actress, mounted on a white horse, started the show, with a ceremonious demand for the keys of the bull pen. The first bull led into the arena was not inclined to fight, but the second one looked at the flaunting red capas, snorted, lowered its head, threw dirt over the lower tiers of seats, and charged the matador. The bulls won as they never do in real fights, for the matadors were in retreat all the time until they touched the bull in a vital spot with their wooden swords, when the animal should have played dead, to have made the show a complete reproduction of the real thing.

A few blocks from Tampa's harbor is a restaurant, in front of which is a sign reading "Turkish, Spanish, French, Italian, Greek, Hebrew, German, and Egyptian spoken." One of the owners, H. B. Cohen, is the remarkable linguist. He was born in Smyrna and has lived in most of the countries mentioned on his sign. He says he came to Tampa in 1908 and took a position as dish-washer at the Tampa Bay Hotel at $6 a week. Now he pays his dish-washers $24 a week. He has entertained as guests of the restaurant persons from every one of the countries mentioned in his imposing list, and translates his bill of fare for them.

One of the attractions of Tampa is the ease with which you can get out of it. The most delightful escape is northward to Temple Terrace Estates, six miles away. This is a subdivision par excellence, on a high rolling plane, bounded by the Hillsboro River on one side and a beautiful orange grove of 4,500 acres on the other. It is all set out to one variety. The subdivision takes its name from the temple orange, which they call a "glorified tangerine," a variety with the characteristics of a small tangerine and some of a large orange.

Temple Terrace has all the standardized attractions of the best subdivision, clubhouse, casino, swimming pool, riding academy, golf course, apartment houses, and daily real-estate "lectures." A caravan of buses and automobiles from St. Petersburg, Orlando, Tampa, and other places brings scores of prospective lot buyers daily, and they are not only entertained with free rides, but with a luncheon, a band concert, and a lecture. If one prospect out of twenty signs on the dotted line and makes a first payment, business is considered good. When the prospects have been well fed, and a bit hypnotized by music and oratory, they are divided into blocks of five and sent out to see the lots in charge of expert salesmen. Prospects who play around the bait, but do not bite, are then invited into the sales office, where they meet extra "high-powered closing men," who manipulate effective landing nets, and the gamiest fish are often safely landed.

Another delightful escape from Tampa will be Davis Islands, when the sand-suckers have completed their work and the islands are properly protected by sea walls. They are only half a mile from the business center of Tampa and are connected with the city by a bridge and causeway.

Started only two years ago, the development here has gone forward with wonderful speed. Three million dollars' worth of sand-made lots are said to have been sold the first day the subdivision was opened, and $12,000,000 worth have been sold since.

A customer who bought an $8,000 lot sold it to a friend of mine at a profit. The latter recently visited the islands and called, somewhat impatiently, at the sales office, with the inquiry: "When can I see my lot?"

"We will get that lot pumped up within thirty days," was the encouraging reply.

But Davis Islands has already completed one of the largest casinos in the State and two large apartment houses. Two hundred Spanish residences have been built. A yacht clubhouse, a country clubhouse, and a magnificent $2,000,000 hotel are being constructed. Lots sold on Davis Islands, originally, at from $6,000 to $10,000. The subdivision was all disposed of several months ago and now there are many resales at prices ranging from $20,000 to $60,000.

Tampa was recently threatened with a small-pox epidemic. The Kiwanis Club, Civic Club, and other commercial organizations, running true to form, called on the newspapers to suppress all mention of small-pox. But the newspapers refused to do so, the health officer advocated proper publicity to promote general vaccination, and in spite of threats that were made to have him removed he won and the threatened epidemic was averted.

Business in Tampa, as well as in many other Southern cities, has been greatly damaged by the freight and express embargo, caused primarily by the strike of the telegraph operators, tower men, and some of the station agents of the Atlantic Coast Line. It is charged that the strike-breakers who took the places of the union workers are incompetent, and there have been many serious accidents on the road. In one case of a head-on collision two engineers and two firemen were killed and twenty-six persons injured.

The strike which tied up the Atlantic Coast Line sent a tremendous lot of freight to the other railroads, which nearly swamped them, and an embargo was necessary to enable the roads to clear their freight houses and yards. They have not cleared them yet, although the express embargo has been lifted. The strike was caused by a disagreement over the matter of seven cents an hour in wages. The railroad has virtually acknowledged the justice of the request of the telegraphers for more pay, for it is paying the strike-breakers as much or more than was asked by their old, experienced and well-trained employees. The public has learned how irregularly trains are running, how they are all greatly behind time, and many who were coming to Florida this winter have gone elsewhere or are staying at home.

While more people came to Florida before the holidays this year than came last year, since the holidays fewer tourists have come into the State than came a year ago. As a consequence, the real-estate men are doing less business than they did last year at this time, and rents for apartments are coming down.

The registration of tourists at the St. Petersburg Chamber of Commerce for the past thirty days has been about half what it was a year ago. The figures for Tampa I am not able to get.

—From "The American Labor Who's Who."

SHE began this amazing record by getting arrested on a street corner when she was fifteen. Her father was arrested with her. He never has been arrested since. It was only the beginning for her.

The judge inquired, "Do you expect to convert people to socialism by talking on Broadway?"

She looked up at him and replied gravely, "Indeed I do."

The judge sighed deeply in pity. "Dismissed," he said.

Joe O'Brien gives me a picture of her at that time. He was sent to cover the case of these people who had been arrested for talking socialism on Broadway. He expected to find a strong-minded harpy. Instead he found a beautiful child of fifteen, the most beautiful girl he had ever seen. A young Joan of Arc is what she looked like to him with her dark hair hanging down her back and her blue Irish eyes ringed with black lashes. That was how she entered the Labor movement. Since then she has never stopped.

Presently she joined the I. W. W., which was then in its golden age. Full of idealism, it swept the Northwest. They had free-speech fights everywhere. The authorities arrested them and more came. They crammed the jails to bursting.

"In one town," said Elizabeth, "there were so many in jail that they let them out during the day. We outside had to feed them. Every night they went back to jail. At last the wobblies decided that when the jail opened they would not come out. People came from far and near to see the wobblies who wouldn't leave jail."

This part of her life, organizing and fighting the fights of the migratory workers of the West, is the part of her life that she likes most. There is no period in all the labor history of America that is more picturesque, that has in it more gaiety and heroism than the early days of the singing wobblies. The very heart of this was "Gurley," not yet twenty, fearless, and beautiful. Her marriage did not affect her activities. The arrival of her son did. His birth closed this chapter of her life.

My first sight of her was in Lawrence in the big strike of 1912. I arrived just after the chief of police had refused to allow the strikers to send their children to the workers' homes in other towns. There had been a riot at the railway station. Children had been jostled and trampled. Women fainted. The town was under martial law. Ettor and Giovannitti were in jail for murder as accessory before the fact.

I walked with Bill Haywood into a quick-lunch restaurant. "There's Gurley," he said. She was sitting at a lunch counter on a mushroom stool, and it was as if she were the spirit of this strike that had so much hope and so much beauty. She was only about twenty-one, but she had gravity and maturity. She asked me to come and see her at her house. She had gone on strike, bringing with her her mother and her baby.

There was ceaseless work for her that winter. Speaking, sitting with the strike committee, going to visit the prisoners in jail, and endlessly raising money. Speaking, speaking, speaking, taking trains only to run back to the town that was ramparted by prison-like mills before which soldiers with fixed bayonets paced all day long. Almost every night when we didn't dine in the Syrian restaurant we dined in some striker's home, very largely among the Italians. It seemed to me I had never met so many fine people before. I did not know people could act the way those strikers could in Lawrence. Every strike meeting was memorable—the morning meetings in a building quite a way from the center of things, owned by someone sympathetic to the strikers, the only place they were permitted to assemble. The soup kitchen was out here and here groceries were also distributed and the striking women came from far and near. They would wait around for a word with Gurley or with Big Bill. In the midst of this excitement Elizabeth moved calm and tranquil. For off the platform she is a very quiet person. It was as though she reserved her tremendous energy for speaking.

The Paterson textile strike followed Lawrence. In Lawrence there was martial law and militia. It was stern, cruel, and rigorous. The Paterson authorities were all of that and besides they were petty, niggling, and hectoring. Arrests were many. Jail sentences were stiff and given for small cause. Elizabeth was also arrested, but set free again. The Paterson strike of all the strikes stands out in her memory. She got to know the people, and their courage and spirit were things that none of us who were there could ever forget.

In the summer of 1916 I went up to the Mesaba Range to report the strike of the iron miners. Elizabeth Gurley Flynn met me at the station, and when I commented on how tired she looked she explained: "You see, none of the hotels will take me in. So I've been living around at the miners, sometimes sleeping with two or three kids and sometimes on broken-down couches." I got a double room in a hotel and she came to stay with me.

I went with her up and down the range through one iron town after another. It seemed to me that she never stopped. Sometimes she spoke in one day at several meetings separated by many miles. She was at strike headquarters the rest of the time, organizing relief, meeting with the strike committee. The committee was hampered by lack of funds, by the terrorizing tactics of the gunmen, by the imprisonment of ten chief organizers. Presently she was sent to Michigan to get strike funds from the miners on the Michigan iron range. Other wobblies who had attempted this had been beaten up, arrested, and taken in cars and dumped over the State border. So it seemed safer for a woman to go.

As we waited for our train in the station at Duluth it was evident that we were being watched. We were being followed. We boarded a different train leaving for a town sixty miles from our destination. We piled out at a desolate little country station at half past three in the morning. A single hotel was open and a boy was asleep there. After about an hour he managed to get us a rickety Ford which belonged to a silent Finn. Sitting behind this mountainous and uncommunicative man we drove cross country to Iron Mountain. As we came into town we had the satisfaction of seeing our shadows standing looking vacantly around the railway station.

We were quartered with some Italian miners. There had been talk that the meeting was to be stopped. Several Italian boys constituted themselves our bodyguard. These young men were not only ready to die for Elizabeth Gurley Flynn; they were quite ready to kill for her. They told her darkly let any of the police so much as peep, much less lay hands on her—well, that would be the end of him. The meeting went off without police interference. But now the bodyguard, augmented by more men, crowded the house. They stalked around gloomily hoping for trouble.

"If the police speak to you, Gurley, we'll look after you."

"Wherever you go there some of us are."

The air was electric. Trouble was coming. Nothing short of a conflict with the police was going to satisfy them.

"There's going to be trouble," Elizabeth said, "if we don't get out of here." We decided to cut our visit short and catch the next train. With more care than we had taken to lose the trail of the police we eluded our saviors and quietly slipped into a car which was standing on a siding. There were plenty of people in jail already.

The strike on the Mesaba Range was the end of Elizabeth Gurley Flynn's activities as organizer in the I. W. W. Just after the Espionage Act had been passed it happened that we went to the theater together. "If I were in the I. W. W. now," she said, "whether I opened my mouth or didn't I would surely be arrested. It's rather nice to draw a long breath." Next day she was arrested just the same. She was one of the 166 people associated with the I. W. W. indicted for conspiracy.

Defense work was no new thing to her, and from 1918 until recently her major activities have been getting political prisoners out of jail. And since 1921 she has concentrated on the Sacco-Vanzetti case. There has been constant work, there have been arrests, there has been her preoccupation with comrades in jail for their opinions. She comes out of her first twenty years in the labor movement undimmed and undiscouraged.

Letters from Tolstoi

[This is the second instalment of a series of hitherto unpublished letters from Leo Tolstoi to Eugen Heinrich Schmitt, a Hungarian philosopher, writer, and anarchist leader. The letters, received between the years 1894 and 1910, were written in German, except for a brief passage in Russian occurring in number X this week. The first eight letters, published in the last week's issue, contained comments and friendly criticisms from Tolstoi regarding the work carried on by Schmitt through his organization, the League of Gnostics, and his publications. Further letters will appear in subsequent issues of The Nation.]

Moscow, March —

YOUR letter, dear friend, gave me great joy. It was so long since I had any news of you that I was very much concerned about you of late. Happily no evil has befallen you apart from that which must befall all of us and which we must all expect in one form or another. I see you are carrying on your war with the same energy and the same skill as before. I shall be frank if you will permit me to be so and I shall tell you what I feared and still fear for you: it is that you lay too much weight upon extraneous events and thereby forget the inward principles of your activity. I mean—could you avow to yourself that your actions would have been the same even though you knew that no man would know anything of them and you yourself would be unaware of their success? I believe that your character disposes you to let yourself be carried away more by external success than the satisfaction of an inner need.

It is only because I love you and treasure your work so highly that I permit myself to make this criticism. I hope that you will not take it ill. I know that "chaque vertue a les défauts de ses qualités" and that you occupy a distinct place in the Christian evolution which is now proceeding everywhere, a place for which you are particularly suited. But I was anxious to call your attention to your heel of Achilles because I am your true friend.

What is there new that I could write you about conditions in Austria and in Hungary apart from the fact that one is pained beyond measure to see how wretchedly stupid human beings may become and how horribly cruel this stupidity makes them? The people do not care about what they wish to communicate to one another but only in what language they may speak. To a Christian the world and all its doings is not only evil and sinful but also wonderful through its sheer folly and simplicity. Human beings are just like little children but without the innocence of children.

It is only yesterday that I gave your address to one of our friends—Arthur St. John, ci-devant English officer. I hope that you will get to know him and have pleasure in his company. Do you know the colony that has been founded in Georgia in the United States and the magazine it publishes, the Social Gospels? They are brothers in the faith. Their address is: Commonwealth, Georgia; Kalpp Albertson.

Your friend for love's sake,

DEAR FRIEND:

I have received the draft of the manifesto as well as your letter of September 10. The idea of the manifesto is good, but I was not so well pleased with the form of it. It should be simpler and easier to understand for people who are not literary. Nor do I think your intention of collecting signatures for the manifesto very expedient. Our single but mightiest weapon is the power of convincing by means of the word, that is, by means of the truth clearly and powerfully expressed. But the mere signatures of persons whose opinions and sentiments we do not know have no value. Go write your manifestos in as strong and convincing a manner as possible—that is the only thing and the best thing you can do.

That other manifest or appeal was written by friends of mine, but it must appear as the foreword to an article or perhaps even a book dealing with the persecution of Christians. I shall send you the book or the article as soon as it is written. I have just received another paper concerning the latest persecutions of the Dukhobors in the Caucasus—it is written by a friend of mine who went there on purpose to find out everything in detail—and I am writing a foreword for this which I shall also send you. The article I should like to have published in the German newspapers of greatest circulation. How shall I proceed with this? As for your periodical I think it would be well if you were to have my preface to a book which has appeared in Russian in Berlin (under the title "Life and Death" by E.) translated and printed. You could secure this book in Berlin or obtain it through a friend of Shkarvan's—Dr. Duschon Makovizky.

I greatly regret that I must write you in German. Unconsciously my letters are thereby given a childish character, as I cannot fluently express my thoughts, so I shall now write you in Russian and hope that you will have no great difficulty in securing a translator.¹

Your suggestion of an appeal to humanity in connection with the prosecutions which are taking place because of the refusal to obey the demands of the state is excellent. You will see that I have done something similar in the preface I wrote for Droszhshin's book—about which I have already written you. I have done this for Droszhshin, you will do it for Shkarvan.² The greater the number of upright and warmhearted men that raise their voices in defense of truth, the better. I listen gladly to your own voice and I believe that it cannot fail to make an impression on men. But forgive me if I give you a little advice: pray, polish your work a little more. Imagine your reader to be a good-natured, intelligent, but uncultured workman and strive to express your thoughts as clearly and simply as possible. I would not advise you to do this did I not know that you are capable of it.

I have known Messrs. Egidy³ and Gutzeit for a long time, and I expect nothing more from them than I expect from all people who consciously accept not the whole truth but only a part of it—namely only an obfuscation of the truth and other things that would prove disadvantageous to the divine work. I am therefore quite in sympathy with your intention of pointing out their errors and thus preventing their being held mistakenly by others to belong to us. Fare you well!

³ Egidy played a considerable role during the nineties as the founder of a new ethical-religious movement.

In all fraternity and love,

DEAR FRIEND:

I have received your letter and the last number of the Religion of the Spirit. The contents of the whole number please me very much, especially your article Without a State. The article will be translated into Russian.

I am sorry to hear that you have so few followers among the Nazarenes. These people are spiritually strong and carry their faith into their lives. And such a man is worth more for the realm of God than a hundred or a thousand who only talk and do not act. These Nazarenes must follow practices similar to those of the Cholokanists, Stundista, and Dukhobors in our country. The oldest among them are always conservative and remain standing upon the level to which they or their predecessors had climbed with such great efforts and they wish to keep the younger men back upon the same level. But the young men must go onward because it is only such progress that constitutes real life, and it is precisely these young people whom one must help and with whom one must enter into communication.

We must write for these people and help them as much as possible. The future of Christianity as well as truth in life abides with these people, with the simple souls, with the workmen, not with the parasites. That letter to Spielhagen was sent to me. You answered him very well.

If I had more time and strength I would have answered Spielhagen alone over the heads of all the Socialist leaders and I would have said what I have longed to say for some time, namely, that the socialistic and liberal attitude is not only vain and can lead to no results but that it is highly pernicious because it attracts the best capacities to it, and instead of accustoming young people to assert and preserve their human dignity it imposes compromises upon them so that many of them go over to the camp of the enemy without noticing it—while they still believe that they are fighting for truth and freedom.

I am delighted to hear that you have got in touch with our English friends.

I am very sorry that I write German so badly, but I hope that you will understand what I wish to say.

DEAR FRIEND:

I had great joy in your last letter and in what you wrote me in relation to the court action you are expecting because of your excellent article Without a State. From what you write me I see that you possess that real freedom which comes to every disciple of Christ as soon as he transfers his ego from the animal to the spiritual. May God aid you to remain always true to this inner conviction.

DEAR FRIEND:

I have received both your letters. Pray excuse me for not having answered you sooner. I am delighted to hear that you have got clear of that entanglement with the government. It was inevitable, even though in a practical sense it may have been very hard on you. May God maintain and keep you in the spirit in which you write and labor.

[No date]

DEAR FRIEND:

You write that human beings cannot understand how participation in the service of the state is incompatible with Christianity. For ages human beings were also unable to understand that indulgences, inquisitions, slavery, and torture were incompatible with Christianity. But the time came when this was finally understood, and the time will also come when, first, the irreconcilable nature of military service with Christianity will be understood, and then, later, with all service to the state in general.

It is now fifty years since Thoreau, a little-known but most remarkable and exceptional American writer whose magnificent essay which has just appeared (in the Revue Blanche of November 1, under the title Désobéir aux lois) not only clearly pointed out the duty of man not to obey the government, but actually himself furnished an example of this non-obedience. He refused to pay the taxes demanded of him, because he did not wish as a participant to give aid to a government which gave legal protection to slavery. He was sentenced to prison for this, and it was in prison that he wrote this essay.

Thoreau refused to pay the tribute of taxes to the state. It is self-evident by the same token that a man cannot serve the state—as you have so beautifully expressed it in your letter to the Minister of State, you consider it incompatible with honor and morality to perform services for an institution which is the representative of the legally consecrated murder of human beings and of legally sanctified exploitation.

Thoreau, it seems to me, was the first who dared to speak this truth—fifty years ago. At that time no one paid any attention to his refusal and to his essay, so strange did both appear. It was regarded as mere eccentricity. But now, fifty years later, your own refusal already occasions talk, as is ever the case when new truths are brought forth. It occasions talk and twofold astonishment—on the one hand that anyone could venture to express such peculiar opinions, and then on the other hand that one did not one's self long since hit upon the truths uttered by this man, truths which now appear so obvious and beyond dispute.

Ballad of Old Doc Higgins

By LEONORA SPEYER

[Awarded second prize in The Nation's Poetry Contest for 1926]

Old Doc Higgins shot a mermaid:
Vowed he'd ketch her, fish or woman, fiend or human;
Carryin' on along the river, caterwaulin' up the river,
Scarin' fish where they lay hid!
Swore he'd hev her, lights an' liver; (and what Doc Higgins swore, he did).

Old Doc Higgins cleaned his gun:
The proper fishin'-hook, he'd swan, fer mermaids' gills;
The slickest tackle! (Leaning on the pasture-wall, old Doc Higgins gave a cackle),
Watch him git her, pesky critter,
Tail an' all.

No one knew but old Doc Higgins:
No, an' none wuz goin' to know, 'twarn't no need fer folks to know.
He saw sister Mame's boy go swimmin' to her, natteral fool!
All uncovered wuz her breast, hair all streamin', shiny'z gold,
An' the rest—a fish's tail gormin' up his troutin' pool!

Higgins saw and never told:
Hev the hull town call him crazy? Sister Mame's boy, loony, lazy, heard him shoutin';
Turned an' laffed ez they went under, started kissin'—let 'em wonder,
Knowin' how the boy cud swim—
They'd make no laffin-stock uv him!

But here's the thing that riled him so:
Jest ez he wuz settlin' down to a peaceful mornin's fishin', (How his baited line would hum up the stream to some swift eddy), Settin' there enjoyin' things while the fish got good an'
ready—he cud feel their noses pushin'—
Jest ez they wuz bitin' some—up she'd come!

Naked to the waist; an' sassy! Wavin' to him, swimmin' by,
shameless hussy;
Or jest singin' ez she floated, kind uv high,
No toon at all . . . (And he noted how her tail would flash and swish—
Gorry, how she scared the fish!) Old Doc Higgins on the shore Yelled and swore.

And he'd watch her at the turning of the river, see her sink Where the willow near the brink dipped to touch the mermaid's locks;
"Shucks," said old Doc Higgins, "Shucks!"
His ears did n't need no wax (thinking of the deafened crew, And Odysseus, fettered fast), Oh he knoo a thing or two,
All the Higginses hed learnin'; need n't tie him to no mast!

Smilin' at him ez she passed—any lunk-head cud see through her—
Like to take a cow-hide to her!

Poor old Mame; her only son . . . (yes, but listen as you hasten,
Listen to the lonely singing, old man with a gun!)

*Ah who will seek Muirish,
The lost one, the sea-swan?
Ah ripples, ah road
Where the foolish, the frolicsome
Strayed to her sorrow!
Muireis is gone
From the waters of Kerry,
Ah tarry not, sisters,
But speedily come!*

*Beneath a strange willow
She grieves with her sorrow,
And all the bright sea-shells
Are fall'n from her hair;
Ah sisters, my friends,
Where the ancient tide ends
Will you fare,
Will you follow
The track of the tears?
To Muirish the lost one,
The sea-swan of Kerry,
Ah tarry not, sisters,
My loves and my dears!*

Ah . . . ah . . . ah . . .

Heathen singin', fit fer Satan! Creeping close as she rose From beneath her willow-bough, old Doc Higgins held his breath . . .

Now!
And a singing turns to sighing, and a sighing pales to dying,
And a dying lifts to death.

Ripples reddening as they float, rippling from a tender throat,
Reddening from a cry of pain . . .
Old Doc Higgins stood there blinking, and his thoughts were not all pretty
As he watched a whiteness sinking; wished he'd hed a good look at her,
Never'd git that chance again.

Gosh, it wuz a fust-rate shot!—Kissin' Mame's boy ez she drowned him,
Lips all pursed up when they found him,
Died uv kissin' like ez not—
Wal, there warn't no use in wishin';
An' tomorrer he'd go fishin'.

Mist can do strange things to rivers, make a ghost of any river:
Such a day is good for fishing; old Doc Higgins vowed he'd never Seen the like, it did beat all, the way the pike

An' pickerel came a-crowdin' round; cat-fish too; and Lord, the trout Jumpin' out!

Peter wuz a fisherman; guessed he'd hev to let him pass—
There wuz bass over there lyin' low—Higgins thot he'd like to go,

His time come to meet his God, with fishin-rod an' basket
spillin';

He'd be willin'! . . . Say you so?
Old Doc Higgins, say you so?

Mist that reaches thick and sallow up the ledges of the land:

Up to where a tired old man sits a while beneath a willow, (Willow-tree, you remember! But does he?)

And his pipe slips from his hand. . . . What's that creeping through the sedges?

Have a care, old Doc Higgins, sleeping there!

Mist that swirls . . . mist . . . mist . . .

Something holds him by the wrist: white and wet and cool and strong—

Fish or woman, fiend or human!

Oh, the shoal of leaping girls all about him, all about him,
Beautiful and baleful throng. . . .

Muirish! Muirish! White Sea-swan!

Sister slain, sister slain! . . . And an answering crimson stain

Rises rippling where she sank.

Oh, the whimpering little man, fighting, frightened on the bank

As he wakes:

Sees a face—pale—pale—

Sees a tail—

Snatches at a bough that breaks!

(Vengeful little willow-tree),

"God-a-mighty! Leave me be! Leave me be!"

Thus they drowned him, old Doc Higgins, with their arms like wreaths around him,

Heavy silver wreaths around him,

Struggling, strangling, tightly pressed to a soft ironic breast.
Thus he lies. . . .

In a grave of running water—who had slain a deep-sea daughter.

Old Doc Higgins, old Doc Higgins, wishing so to die—
a-fishing—

Thus he lies, till all things rise; if there still be aught to rise.

The King of the Waltz

By HOWARD E. GREENE

HAD Johann Strauss been born this year, instead of one hundred years ago, we wonder if he would have carved out so great a place for himself by composing dance music. Our musical mechanics can jazz his "Blue Danube"; but it is hard to imagine him composing its dreamy measures while his thoughts pictured the fantastic figures of the dances we indulge in. Yet, with his genius, he might have adapted jazz—instead of permitting it to adapt him—and made of it a medium of genuine classic expression.

There comes a time in the course of every line of human endeavor when the one person capable of carrying that line to its highest state of development makes his appearance. Strauss was born at just the right time and in exactly the right environment to take up waltz music and advance it as far as it is likely to go.

Johann Strauss, the "waltz king," whose centenary is being celebrated throughout Europe, was the son of Johann Strauss, waltz king that was. Herr Kapellmeister Strauss had no intention of permitting his son to usurp his crown, appearing to suspect the youth of revolutionary tendencies even in his cradle. His suspicions were not altogether based on intuitions. At the age of six, before he knew one note from another, the precocious infant composed his first waltz, his mother jotting down the notes for him. This waltz, "The First Thought," was first formally played on his fifteenth birthday and was declared excellent. The Kapellmeister allowed Johann and his brothers to take piano lessons, but he opposed their larger ambitions; yet all three turned out to be musicians. Johann studied the violin and organ in secret, as well as advanced musical theory, and gave piano lessons to a couple of other children to pay for his own.

The revolt came in 1844, when Johann was 19. Frau Strauss left her husband and Johann went with her and established his own orchestra. His first concert occurred at Dommayer's Casino in Heitzing on October 15. The Vienna Zeitung, which carried his advertising, also carried on the same page the announcement of a Grande Soirée inserted by his father. The boy's concert caused mixed feelings in local musical circles. His waltz, "Die Gunstwerber," was an immediate success. The enthusiasm increased with the selections until he was compelled to play his "Sinngedichte" eighteen times. His success overwhelmed his critics and eventually drove his father out of the country on a tour to win foreign laurels. Outdistanced by the son whom he had tried to suppress, the Kapellmeister returned embittered to die in 1849. Then the son took over his father's musicians and advanced to greater achievements, appearing from time to time in most of the capitals of Europe and finally coming to the United States in 1872, when he led 1,000 musicians at Boston in playing the "Blue Danube" as a feature of the World's Peace Jubilee.

The waltz king was small in size, given to gesticulation, a good dresser, habitually wearing his hat at an angle. He had a merry, childlike disposition and a great love for practical jokes. His letters were full of humor and he carried at the top of his letterheads the initial "J" and the note, E flat, called "S" in German, as a sort of standing jest. He was typically Viennese and his handsome appearance no doubt had something to do with making him the most photographed and painted public man of his city. A word-picture of Strauss in action occurs in Mme de Hegermann-Lindencrone's "In the Courts of Memory." Describing a ball given by the Metternichs for the Emperor and Empress in Paris on May 28, 1867, she said:

At the same moment that their Majesties entered this wonderful ballroom, the famous Johann Strauss, brought from Vienna especially for the occasion, stood waiting with uplifted baton and struck up Blue Danube. . . . No one thought of dancing; everyone wanted to listen to the waltz. And how Strauss played it! . . . With that fire and entrain! We had thought Waldeufel perfect; but, when you heard Strauss, you said to yourself that you had never heard a waltz before. The musicians were partly hidden by gigantic palmettos, plants and pots of flowers, arranged in the most attractive way. But, he! Johann Strauss stood well in front, looking very handsome, very Austrian, and very much pleased with himself.

Naturally such a man could not escape romances. Once, in Russia, a father tried to force him to marry a piano pupil who had fallen deeply in love with him. The Austrian Embassy summoned him almost from the steps of the altar, placed him under arrest, and kept him locked up for weeks until he could be secretly passed over the border. At various concerts in Petrograd he had received flowers from a woman who had called herself "The Unknown." When Strauss finally met her, he fell in love with her; but her parents, who belonged to the nobility, betrothed her to a man of their own choosing and the composer threw himself at the feet of Henrietta Treffz, a singer with an unsavory past, and married her over the protests of his mother. He had cause to regret this rashness. That was in 1862. The same year, in a fit of fear lest his musical inspiration should run out, he studied painting for six months.

The next year he became director of the court balls and in the following seven years composed more than four hundred waltzes. The "Blue Danube" he composed one night when no paper was at hand; so he used his cuffs, which were of the detachable kind. The next morning he threw them in the wash, but Frau Strauss rescued them. He never could understand why this waltz was so popular. It brought him little more than his other waltzes, but it made his publisher rich. About the same time he composed "Künstlerleben," "Geschichten aus dem Wiener Wald," "Wein, Weib und Gesang" (Wine, Woman and Song), "Wiener Blut," and "Bei uns z'Haus." Early in the seventies he began composing his operettas, the best known of which are "Fledermaus" and "Der Zigeunerbaron."

IT has come to the ears of the Drifter that the necessity of restoring the Last Judgment is being made the occasion for quietly disrobing Michelangelo's tumult of heroic figures on the walls of the Sistine Chapel in Rome. The fluttering wisps of draperies that are now being removed were imposed 385 years ago by order of Pope Paul IV, in deference to the outraged modesty of the Italian Purity League of the day. The Drifter passes on the word. It will cause elation in the liberal breasts of artists who cherish their integrity and in the hopeful breasts of editors, like the Drifter's colleagues, who believe that rational views can in the course of time and much linotyping be imposed upon humanity. It will cause no great concern to graduates of courses in the history of art who have learned to walk unblushing through the Metropolitan and the Louvre.

* * * * *

OTHER times, other customs. The Drifter is in the mood to acknowledge it. He recently paid one of his rare calls. It was at the home of old family friends. Now, the Drifter knows for certain that the wife and mother of that estimable fireside was once in her 'teens firmly led home by the hand when, at a party she was attending, "Skip to my Lou" showed tendencies of degenerating into actual dancing. Yet at the moment of the Drifter's call she was sending her daughter off to a ball with no fears whatever for the fearful tortures she should have expected for that daughter's ultimate future. Moreover, she was playing "Rummy" with her husband and sons and would not have swept the cards under the table if it had been the preacher instead of the Drifter who had called. So far down the insidious path staked out by "Authors" and "Old Maid" stroll the mothers of today!

* * * * *

AT any rate, the Drifter is no more excited over the undressing of Michelangelo's splendid nudes than was the great Italian himself at the clothing of them. He said never a word. When Biagio waxed indignant over the painting, which he told Pope Paul III was "only fit to decorate a bathroom or a tavern," the master calmly gave his Minos in Hell the unmistakable features of the complainant. Paul III offered the irate man no help. "It's too bad," the Pope said. "If only Michelangelo had placed you in Purgatory, I might have been able to do something for you; but in Hell, there is no redemption." It was only when Paul IV came along that Biagio, who was the Judge Ford of his day, won revenge and his point. Now, 385 years after, he loses it again. But the Drifter does not rejoice. He knows that if the painting only lasts long enough, before another 385 years are past another Daniel Ricciarelli will be called to do the job over again and become the second seamstress for an again misunderstood artist.

Militarism in Education

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Three hundred and eighty-two universities, colleges, and secondary schools are listed by the War Department as maintaining some form of military training. In 197 schools attendance at drill is to some extent compulsory. Some require it for the first two years, some for the last two years, some for four years.

The actual value of this training for purposes of national defense is very low. It is even lower as a means of promoting physical health and ideals of right citizenship. But as a means of keeping alive the military view of life, its value is high. The military view of life is opposed to freedom of speech and conscience and to faith in reason and good-will as the foundations of security.

Many of our finest young students who come closest in contact with military training see this clearly. The Evanston Interdenominational Student Conference in resolutions, widely printed, declared for abolition of military training in high schools, in church and denominational schools, and in all colleges, including the compulsory features in land-grant institutions. Recently student referendums in such places as the College of the City of New York and Ohio State University have shown majorities against compulsory training.

The National Study Conference of the Churches held in Washington with representatives from twenty-eight communions declared: "We emphatically disapprove of compulsory military training. We urge careful review of the effect of military training in all its phases." The Ohio Pastors' Association during the week the student referendum was being taken at the Ohio State University, and when the whole State was talking about the action of the Cleveland school board in ousting all military training from Cleveland's schools, unanimously voted in favor of abolishing military training in all high schools and its compulsory element in colleges.

Do our churches mean business? Will they back up their own young people and their own representatives? One concrete opportunity to answer this question with an emphatic "Yes" is furnished by the existence of the Committee on Militarism in Education, which issued the widely circulated pamphlet by Winthrop D. Lane. Among its members are Dr. David Starr Jordan, President Arthur E. Morgan, Professor George A. Coe, Professor Manley O. Hudson, Professor Luther A. Weigle, Bishop Francis J. McConnell, the Reverend Walter Russell Bowie, the Reverend Ernest Tittle, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Sherwood Eddy, Alva M. Kerr, Charles M. Sheldon, Wilbur K. Thomas, and William Allen White.

The committee seeks help. This can be given by people in two ways: first, by sending name and address to Committee on Militarism in Education, 387 Bible House, Astor Place, New York City, so that the committee may know on whom to count; second, by sending a contribution, however small, to the emergency fund of $5,000 which must be raised to carry on the fight against a process of militarization which unless stopped will destroy all hope of making America a leader in establishing world peace.

One-Sided Public Hearings

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his letter in The Nation of January 13 Secretary Jardine says that his decision about the narcissus "will rest on answers to three questions, and on nothing else." It seems that he does not yet fully appreciate the issue, or he would have counted in a fourth question not less obviously relevant, viz.: If bulbs from certain sources are cut off by this embargo and the nation derives its supply from other sources, are the latter sources equally infected? Specifically, if the supply from Holland is cut off and we are told to get them from the northern Pacific States, is it or is it not true, as has been publicly alleged, that the Pacific coast bulbs are worse infected than the Dutch bulbs?

Why, after holding a two days' public hearing, does the Secretary not yet know what the principal grounds of objection to the embargo are? Because the hearing, though conducted in the customary way, was not conducted in an even-handed way. The customary way is not even-handed. The opponents of the embargo spoke publicly, and, as I understand, the representatives of the Horticultural Board had the opportunity to question them if they wished. Whatever testimony the board gave to the Secretary was exempt from cross-examination; other persons might ask Mr. Marlatt questions in the public press, but he was not compelled either to answer or to refuse to answer; he could answer such parts as he chose to and overlook the rest as unessential. Yet treatises on the law of evidence say that one of the chief reasons against admitting hearsay evidence is that testimony not submitted to cross-examination is so much less reliable. If at the hearing

Mr. Marlatt had been put on the stand to answer the question why he laid the embargo against Holland and not against Oregon, and had been required either to give a reason for the difference or to say that he did not wish to answer, we should have an issue joined. As it is, respectable persons are charging that the northern Pacific States are grievously infected with the parasites in question and that the board is failing to announce any specific method by which it proposes to guard the rest of the country against their importation from Oregon, but nobody puts himself in the position of denying either of those propositions; consequently there is no dispute in which the evidences on the two sides can be compared.

The trouble is not this specific case but the general custom. When a protest against a governmental policy is recognized as important enough to call for a public hearing, it ought to be part of the routine that the official chiefly responsible should be put on the stand to answer, or refuse to answer, such questions as his critics want to ask. As long as we do not have this rule it will be clear that we do not really regard our officials as our servants but, more or less, as our masters.

In this respect, at least, the British way works better: they do ask an official to answer questions.

Romain Rolland's Sixtieth Birthday

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On the 29th of January Romain Rolland celebrates his sixtieth birthday and many in all parts of the world are blessing him for his service and leadership. The struggles and accomplishments of these years are a long and intricate story with sequels still in the making—but in a paragraph perhaps one can best evaluate them by saying that with brilliant mind and honest heart he created Jean Christophe, and then when the crisis verified itself in history Romain Rolland with undimmed vision and unshaken moral courage stood fast by his standards and ideals.

He repeated in deed the word of his own Olivier: "I love my dear France; but I cannot slay my soul for her sake—nor betray my conscience. That would be the betrayal of my fatherland. How can I hate without hatred? Or without falsehood play a part in the Comedy of Hate? I will not hate. I will be just to my enemies. In the midst of all suffering I will keep a clear vision that I may have understanding and love for all."

Now a birthday is bringing him congratulatory messages from all over the world, from the great ones and from the unknown; from men of letters and young artists; from "Young India" and from Tagore; from a Japanese sculptor and from the "Rollandist" group in Japan; from an English author who hopes to celebrate the seventieth and eightieth anniversaries in like comradeship with the world grown more sympathetic to their teachings; from American youth who in their disillusionment in the trenches found salvation in the sanity of Jean Christophe; and from a chorus of many tongues thankful that Romain Rolland's life and work still give faith and hope.

Salutations to the world's Peace Laureate.

First Call for Breakfast

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Books, Art, Plays

First Glance

THAT the poetry of the American Indians was great poetry of some sort has been manifest ever since the Bureau of American Ethnology, the American Folk Lore Society, and other such institutions began to encourage its study and to print reliable texts along with reliable—though not always interesting—translations. This material, however, either has remained inaccessible to a public not inclined to get its poetry through research or has seemed somewhat formidable, once a layman found it, because of the armor of scholarship in which it was laced. For at best the poetry of the Indian is many removes from any poetry that we know, having to be approached, if it is to be reached at all, through a series of arduous disciplines and adjustments. Latterly there have been efforts by individuals to bring it more directly to its natural public. Natalie Curtis's "The Indians' Book" is still the most effective of these efforts, though the anthology of Indian poems which George W. Cronyn brought out seven years ago under the title "The Path on the Rainbow" achieved a genuine popularity. More recently Mrs. Mary Austin in "The American Rhythm" established the importance of Indian poetry as a sign showing the path which all American poetry in the future might have to take. And now in a new anthology, "American Indian Love Lyrics and Other Verse" (Macmillan: $1.75), Miss Nellie Barnes returns to the argument.

Mrs. Austin contributes a foreword to Miss Barnes's book, while Miss Barnes in a concluding essay discusses the matter of Indian poetic form; and both are right in their insistence upon the difficulties besetting anyone who tries truly to master the secrets of this most intricate aboriginal art. Mrs. Austin once more invokes the "landscape line" and speaks of "environmental distinctions between Zuñi and Iroquois and Omaha"; while Miss Barnes analyzes at some length the varieties of "thought-movement" and "thought-rhythm" which one should educate oneself to feel before presuming to comprehend the full beauties contained in her book. Both are certainly right in their contempt for the quantities of pseudo-Indian verse with which we happen at present to be blessed. And yet I suspect that they are defeating their purpose when they offer the thorns rather than the flowers of Indian verse to the first eager grasp of those modern poets whom they evidently wish to instruct. I am convinced that every contemporary American poet who takes his profession seriously would do well to read Miss Barnes's collection—along with those mentioned above. But I am sorry that it comes with so much apparatus.

For many of the poems taken here from Natalie Curtis, Alice C. Fletcher, Alice Corbin, Mrs. Austin, and Washington Matthews are very beautiful. And I cannot doubt that a poet left to himself would discover the proper reasons for their beauty. If these were his own reasons rather than the ethnologist's, perhaps so much the better. At any rate he could not fail to observe the truth of Miss Barnes's all too few remarks upon the fact that "the rhythms of nature float through the rhythms of Indian verse." One susceptible to the American sky and the American terrain cannot but acknowledge the Indian as the poetic master of these elements which he was. Who can tell how much American poetry may result from such an acknowledgment?

In Eda Lou Walton's "Dawn Boy: Blackfoot and Navajo Songs" (Dutton: $2.50) we have an attempt, unfortunately not always successful, to make American poetry out of Indian poetry. Miss Walton in eschewing the repetitions so characteristic of her originals achieves at best an intelligent clarity and at worst a certain barrenness. The repetitions are frequently annoying, but always, it would seem, they are necessary.

MARK VAN DOREN

From John Brown to George Babbitt

Amerika und Sein Problem. Von M. J. Bonn. München: Meyer und Jessen.

ACCORDING to Professor Bonn the outstanding problem of America grows out of the fact that into this vast extent of territory with its diversity of soil, climate, and landscape there has streamed for more than a century a population which we have attempted to cast in the Puritan mold of New England. Will this aggregation of humanity, formed of many races, ever be amalgamated into a single type? Or, now that the turbulent stream of immigration has been shut off at its source, will there be an evolution in which the tone and colors of European civilization are reflected? This is the problem which Professor Bonn proceeds to analyze by sketching the landscape, the physical features, and those sections of the population that have common characteristics because of racial or historical origins.

This leads him to devote a chapter to the province of Quebec; and it is here that he makes his most original contribution. There is something unusually vivid in his account of "New France"; of how a section of the Old World was transplanted here on the banks of the mighty St. Lawrence, how a society grew up where the church was to rule the spiritual life, the king the political, and the feudal lord the social; and finally how it all failed in the defeat of Montcalm by Wolfe in 1759, followed by the peace of 1763, in which England gained the New World. This event partly freed America from Europe; the revolution completed the process. But the French in Canada will never be assimilated; they will always form an island in the great Anglo-American ocean.

New England and the West are subjected to a similar treatment, and having thus traced the lines of historical development Professor Bonn next considers the social problems that give rise to the political. He ruthlessly overturns the "melting-pot" and, on examining its contents, concludes that, in spite of the heat applied, it did not fuse. Neither has the process of Americanization, attended with all the patriotic fervor of Rotary and Kiwanis clubs, secret societies, and expulsion of aliens, brought about a standard of the New England type. In fact, the Ark of the Covenant of American civilization seems to have been Ellis Island rather than Plymouth Rock. To the foreigner American civilization must have meant something external only, a fabric woven of material whose fibers were too weak to resist the force of new ideas. There was no inner unity, because the soul of the foreigner was not understood; and the fact that we tolerate the Ku Klux Klan and the exclusion acts is the most positive proof that the great majority of Americans have given up all hope of assimilation.

Nor has America become Europeanized. New York City with its foreign population is not America, neither is California with its political intolerance and its boastful exaggerations; the nearest approach to the present American type is still found in the Midwest, where soil, climate, landscape, and a spirit of detachment conspired to form a somewhat narrow but rugged and vigorous type characteristic of agrarian communities.

Through all the diversity of external forms a spirit of unity has forced itself and has attempted to impose upon all the acceptance of a common standard of mediocrity. But the spirit of our democracy itself has changed. To come from John Brown to George Babbitt is to come a long way; striking is the contrast between that democracy which welcomed Kossuth and that which for the same reasons now excludes the Karolyis. Whatever the underlying cause of the change that has come over the spirit of America since the Civil War, the doctrine of force applied to the newcomer and non-conformist has crushed the spirit of liberty and dulled the sense of moral values. It has resulted in the creation of a new American type which our industrial technique is attempting to standardize. Against this tendency the old spirit of freedom, subdued for an historical moment only, rebels, and a new multiform life begins. America's problem is to liberate the conflicting elements of our national life and so coordinate them that peaceful evolution may not be interrupted by a violent explosion such as recently blew the European system to atoms.

Paul Morand

Closed All Night. By Paul Morand. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

TO convey the flavor of Paul Morand one needs to be able to convey the flavor of jazz, and critics mostly flounder when they strive to communicate that roystering, sad, ecstatic expression of too civilized, too disillusioned man weeping and exulting over the rediscovery of his ancient and restoring lusts. The enormous sadness of jazz is greater than the sadness of Dante, and the ecstasies of jazz are more violent than the ecstasies of Goethe and of Anacreon France. Yeats once listed as the qualities of journalists "their absorption in the life of the moment, their delight in obvious originality and in obvious logic, and their shrinking from the ancient and the insoluble." Jazz at its best sweeps us off our feet because it unites an ecstatic absorption in the life of the moment with an insistence on the ancient and the insoluble.

But to convey bogglingly the flavor of Morand is to tell almost as little about him as the uninitiated get from a first reading of one of his books. His competence in the titillating craft is luscious and deadly. "The first violin advanced toward us, holding poised on his instrument a flexible waltz, which he suddenly pours into our fruit plates." There seems no disillusion, no disease of the flesh, to which Morand is a stranger. He has a keen ear for the crepitations of the soul. In all these so-called character sketches, which are likewise little epitomes of the jazz era in different localities, or, as William Drake lucidly explains the sulphurous compound, "a long sequence of brilliant clinical notes on post-war European society," there are passages of subtle observation that put a Strachey or a Bradford to the blush and almost land Morand in the company of Turgenev and Balzac.

And so the jazz, we see, is hybrid. For what business have these exquisite little cameos to be scattered about in the racket of saxophones? What business here has the pervading melancholy of the disillusioned post-warrior who thinks he sees civilization hastening to its ruin? Or why should the whole be enameled all over with the hard brilliancy of the precocious young aesthete who knows his way about, the precocious young cosmopolite who was born in Russia and polished in Oxford, who knows Rome and Madrid, New York and Bangkok, and sees through them all and exults savagely in them all, and ties them all?

But to call the jazz hybrid is only to say that Morand has made it over in his own image. And that image is too startlingly new to classify as yet. Like Villon he pours with unexampled zest the newest water of experience. Like Petronius he writes the thing he loves. Only time will show whether the wine of his emotion can grow rich and old.

The Wood and the Trees

Prometheus, or Biology and the Advancement of Man. By H. S. Jennings. The Today and Tomorrow Series. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

Evolution and Genetics. By Thomas Hunt Morgan. Princeton University Press. $2.

Why We Behave Like Human Beings. By George A. Dorsey. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

AN anthology of interesting facts is no more science than a list of pigments is art. Yet most popularizers paste together strings of facts that may amuse, interest, or astonish, and sell the result as science. It takes an outstanding scientist to popularize science, a man great enough to see beyond the mountains of fact the significant developments in the search for truth and at the same time broad enough in his sympathies to present these clearly in relation to common knowledge. Mr. Jennings is such a man. He is profoundly intimate with the field of experimental breeding, yet he is able to give the most recent findings on the relative roles of environment and heredity in a pocket booklet.

In contrast to the hard and fast Mendelism found in textbooks, Mr. Jennings points out that there are no such things as characters in the adult that depend upon single units of heredity; in fact, every character depends upon many if not all of the units carried by the germ cells. Every stage in development from the egg to death is the reaction of the constitution of the cells and their surroundings—heredity and environment. There is no structure due alone to heredity; there is no response to a changed environment that is not limited by the hereditary materials from which the person started.

Prometheus brought fire; man devised clothes and civilization and vaccines. The weak and non-resistant are more and more permitted to breed their kind. The better the conditions, the weaker becomes the stock. Thus the eugenists. But there is nothing to prove that the softening is more potent than the beneficial effects of the improved conditions. Negative eugenic measures in cutting down the number of extreme degenerates may accomplish something toward the advancement of man, but the really important measure is to remove the futility, incompetence, and unreason responsible for social disasters. This the eugenists would do by selecting the superior. But nature has set up a system to prevent uniformity in man; great men never reproduce themselves. "Capitalists will contrive to produce artists, poets, socialists, and laborers; laboring men will give birth to capitalists, to philosophers, to men of science; fools will produce wise men and wise men will produce fools."

With this general view Mr. Morgan, the acknowledged leader of modern geneticists, fully agrees. "Evolution and Genetics" is a revision of "A Critique of the Theory of Evolution," with a new chapter on the Non-Inheritance of Acquired Characters and one criticizing the evidence of human inheritance. While admitting the validity of conclusions that certain structural peculiarities are inherited according to known laws, Mr. Morgan considers the evidence for psychological traits—even insanity and feeble-mindedness—to be obscure. For "normal" mental differences the case is still more dubious. In consequence of this he is "inclined to think that the student of human heredity will do well to recommend more enlightenment on the social causes of deficiencies rather than more elimination in the present deplorable state of our ignorance as to the causes of mental deficiencies." He advises a little good-will on the part of the race propagandists in the face of the extraordinary difficulty of discovering the genetic basis of behavior.

The one connection between Mr. Morgan and Mr. Dorsey is that the latter, too, objects to race propaganda. Unfortunately he is laughing so much of the time, and he objects to so many people, that none of his attacks will be taken seriously.

Under cover of popularization, and with the need of drawing a crowd, he becomes sarcastic, flippant, loud-mouthed, unbuttoned; and the crowd gathers. He sets out to tell "why we behave like human beings," but he does not get beyond telling how the human body works—in the first half largely its internal workings, in the second mainly its behavior according to J. B. Watson. Like the typical popularizer he gives mazes of facts, but with this difference: they are forced down your throat by a staccato, tom-tom style. Inebriation from driest subjects. Abandon. Dazzling fire-works. Epigrammatic; a-grammatical. Illustrative; alliterative. Elliptical; complete. You read till you are pummeled senseless. This Coney Island, electric-sign, jazz method does not sell science; it sells Dorsey.

The World Court

The World Court. By Antonio S. de Bustamante. Translated by Elizabeth F. Read. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THE fact that Judge de Bustamante is one of the judges of the World Court entitles his book to a special measure of respect. But the reviewer, like the law, is no respecter of persons, and he must judge the book solely on its merits. The judgment, which may be briefly rendered, is wholly favorable.

The book is admirable. The author traces rapidly the historical antecedents, outlines the various projects as to an international court during the past several centuries, describes the Hague Conference and the Central American Court of Justice, gives an excellent picture of the steps that finally led to the creation of the present World Court, summarizes that Court's procedure and jurisdiction, and serviceably tells what the Court has done up to the present time. The chapter on Sanctions does not deserve quite as much praise as do the other portions of the book. This business of sanctions—a polite word for the exercise of compulsion and force—is a delicate, or perhaps more accurately, an indelicate one. While the author indicates that the highest sanction a world court can have is public opinion, he points out none the less that "the benefits of Article 13 of the Covenant have already been made applicable to the Court's decisions."

In temper the book is all that it should be. Judge de Bustamante avoids the rhetoric and pomp which seem so often to flow from the pen of international authors. It is refreshing to find here no claim of infallibility. For example, in connection with the moot question of advisory opinions, the author remarks that "it is dangerous to make prophecies beside the cradle. If they come true it is almost always by chance." Such an attitude affords a welcome contrast to the cocksureness of Professor Hudson of Harvard. Miss Read's translation is excellent.

Mr. Morley's Fancy

THIS story has left the general reading public in doubt as to what it is all about, and the reason lies somewhere between the mental laziness of the average reader and a technical fault in the story itself. The book is a fantasy, one of these unreal constructions which should be approached in a dream-mood capable of easy and immediate acceptance of certain inaccuracies and improbabilities. It seems hardly necessary to add that if one is to get the most out of a dream there must be a deliberate working out of its symbolism after it is all over. To be secure in its final effect such a book as Mr. Morley's should either have some new, inspired solution ready to wake the reader up or be carried to such a clearly pointed explanation of its mechanism that there is little difficulty in quickly gathering up the loose ends of allegory. A falling short in this latter respect is the fault I find with "Thunder on the Left."

Certainly the book has nothing new to say. The plea for a return to the simplicity of childhood in our relations with the world is a very old one. A poet's longing for the simple beauty shared by nature and the gods—a sentimental regression to a childhood untarnished by custom and superficiality—is hardly a practical answer to the question what is wrong with adult life. But aside from this flabbiness in fundamentals there is good trickery in the book, like that of the stage magician who produces a great variety of things from what looks like an old hat. There is fine tracery of psychological detail, and of mood and emotion. The characters are sketched with rare freshness and alertness. And I do not mean to say that there are not times when Mr. Morley strikes deep notes with his left-handed thunder—when, for instance, he shows a child suffering from the start because of the self-centered blindness of his elders or when he suggests that the child personality in all of us may occasionally be the only guide out of some labyrinth of mind or conduct. Most pleasing is the classical arrangement of the plot time—a week-end only, and embroidered on it, backward and forward, lives and years, the pathetic little love story of Martin and Joyce, broken before it is begun. And the week-end itself is only the vision of another hour. More than this I must not let myself be tempted to discuss. One doesn't break an iridescent bubble just blown; one doesn't recapitulate the details of a fantasy.

Books in Brief

Collected Poems. By Vachel Lindsay. Revised and Illustrated Edition. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

Selected Poems. By Edgar Lee Masters. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Mr. Lindsay, who has written a small amount of excellent poetry, loses by collection all that Mr. Masters, who has written a large amount of excellent poetry, gains by selection. Mr. Masters, who has been too voluminous, will even further consolidate his position with this meaty volume. Mr. Lindsay, growing ever more voluminous, will soon be lost from sight.

A Wild-Animal Round-up. By William T. Hornaday. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

A rather chaotic account, by one, however, who knows his job, of adventures undergone in the killing or capturing of wild animals and the exhibiting of them in a metropolitan zoo.

The Adelphi Edition of the Works of Jane Austen. London: Martin Secker. Seven volumes.

Lady Susan. By Jane Austen. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

The most complete edition to date of Jane Austen's writings, containing, as it does, not only the six finished novels but the fragmentary "Lady Susan" and "The Watsons." Unfortunately "Sanditon," "Love and Friendship," and the incomparable letters are still lacking. Several subsequent volumes comprising these would make this edition all that could be desired. It is less elegant than the fine Oxford edition of 1923, but easier to handle; the typography and binding are attractive; the sensible introduction by Frank Swinnerton appreciates Jane Austen without descending to sentimentality and gives her credit for both malice and gaiety—that is, considers her as something less than a saint. There are, happily, no notes; this is an edition for readers and rereaders, not for students. "Lady Susan" now appears in an edition uniform with the recent "Sanditon," with all the author's misspellings intact. A true copy of the original manuscript, it is as such valuable both as displaying Miss Austen's vagaries in the matter of punctuation and her weakness for "beleive" and "veiw."

Impressment of American Seamen. By James Fulton Zimmerman. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

An exhaustive study of a controversy which, although at no time of first-rate importance in Anglo-American diplomacy, played a leading part in inflaming American opinion against Great Britain and bringing on the War of 1812. Dr. Zimmerman points out that the legal complications which resulted from the conflict between the British theory of indefensible allegiance and the American doctrine and practice of naturalization were not, in fact, the most important aspect of the quarrel and that the lack of a proper system of enlisting seamen for the British navy did a good deal to keep British practice in countenance. As a matter of fact the American doctrine of expatriation, "in the fulness of its expression," was "never stated by the American government until 1848, after the impressment controversy had ended," the main objection to British procedure being based on the attempt to give to a municipal prescription the character of international law, thereby perverting a legitimate right of search into a means of enforcing British allegiance on neutral vessels found on the high seas. It is interesting to note that although the controversy ceased to cumber American diplomacy after the Ashburton treaty of 1842, and expatriation was legalized by Parliament in 1870, the right of impressment was never formally renounced.

Art

Louis Lozowick

THE hierarchy of the arts, so far as experimental development is concerned, for at least the last twenty-five years has been something like this: painting, poetry, the novel, the drama. I am not sure just where music would come in, but formal innovation began with painting, trickled through the free verse movement, went by way of Stein and Richardson into the novel, and is only now entering the theater. The present is a period of synthesis, and as usual painting leads the way. Comprehensibility, lucidity, and content are assuming new values, but this does not mean a return to the gentle romantic standards of 1895.

At the New Art Circle have been on exhibition the works of a young American of thirty five who has already attracted a great deal of attention in France and Germany. The cityscapes of Louis Lozowick are almost as far removed from the pure painting of Cézanne's followers as they are from the pre-Raphaelite maidens of Burne-Jones. In one sense they are almost literature—Seattle in these pictures is definitely Seattle, New York is definitely New York; the titles add to their value, and no one having seen them can disassociate them from what they portray. And although Lozowick has had a long and exacting training in cubism, his pictures are perfectly comprehensible—put them in any shop-window and every street urchin will know what they are about. Lozowick has used the language of modern painting to express something both magnificent and convincing.

Ten paintings and ten black-and-whites formed the exhibition. The black-and-whites were done wholly with ruler and compass—the paintings considerably so. No paintings I have ever seen succeeded so well in conveying the hardness of modern life. The paintings (with a couple of exceptions) were abstract landscapes—huge mental panoramas of the essential qualities of as many selected American cities. In this they bore some relation to the works of Joseph Stella, but where Stella sees the chaotic confusion of the machine age Lozowick sees its essential orderliness, its integration. The plastic qualities, with the single exception of the color, were admirable—though each painting had a definite representational value, each formed a balanced and almost geometrical design with subtle and harmonious overtones and variations affording extraordinary interest and depth.

In many curious ways these paintings run parallel to the ancient Chinese landscapes. The Chinese painted the country, Lozowick paints the city; like theirs, however, his paintings represent no definite scene anywhere actually existing, but a synthesis of the essential qualities of scenes created in the painter's mind. Like theirs, his have some story value; like theirs, his are essentially contemplative rather than sensuous. Like the Chinese again, and unlike almost every other modern artist, Lozowick paints vast panoramas—and these not as mere retreating sequences from some smaller interest closer at hand; the panorama is the subject, and the only subject, of most of his pictures. And finally, like the Chinese, Lozowick has never learned the modern use of color. His paintings are in reality tinted drawings, in which respect he has the defect of Blake, who, unexcelled in line, never learned, in the modern phrase, to model with color. Light-and-shade values are excellent, and the paintings themselves reproduce much better than do the lithographs which Lozowick has made after some of the same subjects, but there seems no compelling necessity for the color treatments actually used, and the fact that some of the canvases have been restudied in various colors would tend to show that the artist himself is aware of this limitation. In two cases, the Butte and the Minneapolis, both of which are in different tones of the same color, the uncertainty conspicuously does not exist, and the example of the Chinese again, who also use one or two colors, would indicate that this is the best method for an artist who has a less fundamental feeling for color than he has for line.

The black-and-whites, less ambitious than the canvases, were wholly successful. They are intended as units for continuous decorative designs, such as those in wall-paper, for instance. Modern decorative design is in every instance the geometric simplification of elements taken originally from the world around us—flowers, trees, human figures, and so forth. Lozowick believes that the inorganic world surrounding modern man is as fertile in subjects for decorative use as the organic world of our ancestors; and the girders, the automobile tires, the cams and cogwheels that he has organized into designs of almost painful beauty are enough, I think, to convince any skeptic that he is right. No one who has looked at this exhibition can thereafter fail to see a new meaning in the gorgeous and intricate delicacy of machines or in the smooth majesty of skyscrapers.

ROBERT WOLF

Another Modern

FRANZ WERFEL, the most admired of contemporary German writers for the stage, could hardly receive a more advantageous introduction to the American public than that which is afforded by the current production of "The Goat Song" (Guild Theater). The Guild has given the piece a gorgeously beautiful series of settings designed by Lee Simonson and has intrusted the leading parts to a group of unusually capable actors. The result will be not only the thrilling of many spines but the wagging of many heads as well; for though the interest and the excitement of the piece are unescapable, Werfel is one of those writers who insist upon suggesting that more is meant than meets the eye. His story of a misbegotten monster who finally escaped from the prison in which its terror-stricken parents had hidden it to spread the spirit of revolt and destruction over the countryside is told in the most straightforward of manners, and it is vivid enough to constitute its own excuse for being, even though it possessed no more than that ambiguous air of relevance which clings about every thrilling legend and which gives to the story of Hamlet or Don Juan as many meanings as there are imaginations to interpret it. But Werfel, unfortunately perhaps, is a conscious metaphysician as well as a poet; he insists that we understand him as he wants to be understood, and in the preface to his version of "The Trojan Women" he sets forth a theory of tragedy which is supposed to explain not only the play which his remarks preface but, I presume, "The Goat Song" as well.

The world into which man is born (I paraphrase the German edition) is essentially meaningless. Impulse and Accident rule all things, while Reason, the fearful distinction of man alone, stands terrified before the brutal drama of the elements. Yet from this disjunction between Man and Nature springs tragedy, a spark which leaps from the pole Reason or Sensibility to the pole called Life or Accident. It is the accusation which humanity brings against fate; it is the result of the fact that there exists in all nature an original sin for which man alone is compelled to atone; and yet it is only the tragic sentiment of life (pace Unamuno) which can transform the chaos of Nature into a Cosmos. And thus if "The Goat Song" must be diagrammed the diagram is, I take it, as follows: The monster, so unwillingly born and so carefully guarded, is the original sin of Nature. When released from its bonds through the carelessness of a rationalistic doctor with a leaning toward an eighteenth-century faith in the beneficence of Nature it spreads destruction; and because Earth-guilt is eternal the monster is no sooner thought dead than the heroine discovers the first signs of life in the son which she is, by and by, to bear it.

Now, this is first-rate metaphysics. It is old-fashioned German idealism which has given up the struggle to prove that all is really for the best and which, turned pessimist, has confessed that there must exist an eternally unreconcilable conflict between Phenomenon and Idea, to each of which is granted an ultimate reality. But metaphysicians do not usually write good drama, and "The Goat Song" is good less because Werfel has formulated a systematic metaphysics than because he happens also to possess the imagination of a poet—as the result of which his symbols take on a concreteness which makes it not only possible to forget that they represent abstractions but, indeed, rather difficult to remember that they do. To the making of his temperament has gone a good deal more than the influence of a peculiarly German philosophical tradition. He has the exacerbated nerves of the typical modern, and that weariness of life which leads men to seek the thrill of the horrible for its own sake plays a larger part in his artistic processes than he would care to admit. His plays succeed because, though they are put forth as the expression of a philosophy, they are in actuality expressions of that much more complex thing called temperament and are thus more rich and varied than even his own interpretations of them can be. The story of "The Goat Song" was suggested, it is said, by an actual event, but he has made of it a legend with all the concreteness of outline and all the intriguing ambiguity of significance which constitute the legend's poetic fascination. Alfred Lunt, Blanche Yurka, Lynn Fontaine, and Dwight Fry contribute admirably rich characterizations to the present performance.

At Maxine Elliott's Theater Bertha Kalich is giving a vigorous and effective if not particularly subtle performance in Sudermann's "Magda," a play which somehow remains eminently actable and genuinely interesting in spite of the sledgehammer blows with which it drives home its now fairly obvious thesis. "A Weak Woman" (Ritz Theater) is a French farce based upon the eternal polygon in which A and B love C while D loves A and E loves B. It is, however, amusing, naughty, and adroit, and it retains a good deal more of Gallic salt than is usual in our versions of such pieces—a fact which is doubtless due to what appears to be an excellent adaptation by Ernest Boyd. "Embers" (Henry Miller Theater) belongs to the equally well-established French tradition of solemn domestic drama. It is as orderly and as lifeless as a syllogism.

The Facts About Locarno

By OSCAR T. CROSBY

MR. GEORGE GLASGOW writes in the Contemporary Review, December, 1925, as follows: "It was the psychology of Locarno that mattered. The interesting thing was that few people took any interest in the actual texts."

The Locarno spirit was doubtless one of real desire to seek peace. The Locarno institutions envisage war. True, the Locarno agreements contain clauses which seem to substitute peaceful settlement of disputes for any resort to war. But what are the facts?

1. The substitution is found to be subject to such exceptions that, in effect, the arbitration agreements will probably not be applicable to any realities whatever.

2. The renunciation of war in the Security Pact is found to be not more complete than is now the general case under the League Covenant and the Court Protocol.

3. On the other hand, with respect to certain particular cases, the signatories enjoy a wider right of making independent war than is given them by the Covenant. The hopeful reader of the agreements is lured by a succession of mirages over a desert of sterile words.

4. The League is treated as an incompetent. It cannot now, according to the Locarno gospel, give "sufficient protection" to its members, and in the new agreements the five signatories presume to prescribe to the Council procedures not found in the Covenant.

Article 6 of the Security Pact reads as follows:

The provisions of the present treaty do not affect the rights and obligations of the High Contracting Parties under the Treaty of Versailles or under arrangements supplementary thereto, including the agreements signed in London on August 30, 1924. (The Dawes Plan.)

Practically all possible mutual relationships between the signatories of the present treaty are twisted up in some way with their "rights and obligations" under the Treaty of Versailles or the Dawes Plan. To these engagements almost any dispute arising between the Locarno parties could be referred even fifty years hence. In such case the present treaty would not apply.

It must be borne in mind also that the Treaty of Versailles includes the Covenant of the League of Nations. Hence all the "rights or obligations" of disputants under the Covenant remain untouched by the Locarno treaty. Thus, under conditions described in the Versailles treaty, the French claim a right to enter German territory, as they did when they occupied the Ruhr. If similar circumstances arise again the French may again march into Germany claiming that their act is not a "resort to war." Nothing in the new treaties would bear on the dispute.

Another startling limitation upon the scope of the Locarno agreements is found in the arbitration treaties. It appears in Article 1, which reads as follows:

All disputes of every kind between A and B with regard to which the parties are in conflict as to their respective rights . . . shall be submitted for decision either to an arbitral tribunal or to the Permanent Court of International Justice, as laid down hereafter. . . . This provision does not apply to disputes arising out of events prior to the present treaty and belonging to the past.

Here, indeed, we have a "new era," a new phraseology. Here is an assumption that the near future will present questions wholly discontinuous with the past. If the Locarno engagement to arbitrate disputes about rights or obligations is to mean anything at all, we must suppose the emergence of questions divorced entirely from the Versailles treaty, from the Dawes Plan, and from the past.

All over the world it has been heralded that the Locarno signatories have agreed not to make war with one another. And, indeed, so it would seem if one reads Paragraph 1, Article 2, of the Security Pact. Here are brave words:

Germany and Belgium and also Germany and France mutually undertake that they will in no case attack or invade each other or resort to war against each other.

Full stop—complete sentence—apparently nothing more to be said. A glance shows us that there are three exceptions. They are introduced by an entirely separate sentence referring to the one just above quoted, and the wording is as follows:

This stipulation shall not, however, apply in the case of (1) the exercise of the right of legitimate defense, that is to say, resistance to a flagrant breach of Article 42 or 43 of the said Treaty of Versailles, if such breach constitutes an unprovoked act of aggression and by reason of the assembly of armed forces in the demilitarized zone immediate action is necessary.

Here we are back to where all the League efforts have left us. We still have the right to strike back; we still have the right to determine what constitutes an "attack" or "invasion" or a "resort to war." History is full of instances showing the elasticity of the words "attack" and "resorting to war." "Invasion" is a little more definite. But mandated territory presents a problem as to whether or not the sovereign is invaded; and now airplane maneuvers will produce confusion even as to invasion of home territory.

We know that a casus belli may now be found either on the earth or in the waters under the earth or in the firmament above the earth. And we know that all these hidden sources of war are reserved to the signatories of the Locarno peace treaties.

But the peace-seeking signatories have not been satisfied with leaving their general war-making powers just where they were placed by the Covenant. They have added cases in which their own independent judgment as to certain "acts of hostility" will make for them a right and a duty to "resort to war." Specific provisions (Articles 42 and 43) of the Treaty of Versailles are invoked. They declare that Germany, within certain portions of her own territory, shall do nothing whatever that has an air of military preparation. This great nation in that respect is placed in a category lower than that assigned to Liberia or Haiti. And it is now solemnly provided that if Germany does anything in this demilitarized area which, in the judgment of her neighbors, calls for "immediate action," then the "resort to war," the "invasion," the "attack" of Germany by these neighbors is not the kind of invasion, attack, or resort to war which is renounced by the present treaty.

In this way even the weak bonds laid upon League members by the Covenant are rudely broken. For the Covenant itself supposes that League action will be taken in respect to a violation by Germany of the prescriptions of Articles 42 and 43.

If there were any doubt as to the inference just above made it disappears when we find in the present treaty that Great Britain and Italy declare their freedom to enter the lists of war if they deem that happenings in the Rhine district constitute a "flagrant breach" of the articles named and that the necessity for "immediate action" has once more arisen.

This is the great "guaranty of security," hailed everywhere as having marked a second birth of the Christmas spirit.

War may now break out over some hue and cry raised about doubtful happenings in the Rhine area; five nations may be aflame, and they can all point to the "present treaty" as a justification for their failure to make any appeal to the League of Nations before "resorting to war." This, indeed, is a "new era."

It is true that in this case the League Council "will be apprised of the question." And the signatories "undertake to act in accordance with the recommendations of the Council provided that they are concurred in by all the members other than the representatives of the parties which have engaged in hostilities." Meantime, while they are apprising the Council, and the Council, with its reduced numbers of voting members, is inquiring into the situation, the parties signatory to this peace agreement of Locarno are, according to their own private undertakings, "to be engaged in hostilities."

The appeal made under such circumstances to a small number of badly frightened Powers sitting in the din of war would probably dissolve the League of Nations.

Surely it is dangerous to introduce in a treaty the phrase "any question with regard to respective rights," placing it in apposition to the phrase "all other questions." Yet this is done in the Security Pact, and these two presumably separate classes of cases are sent to different kinds of tribunals. Nay, more, an important distinction in the effect of decision in the two cases is established. An engagement is made to comply with the decision in respect to questions of "right." In the matter of "all other questions," no such engagement is made.

A new council, called the Conciliation Commission, is created to consider "all other questions." But its decisions are not binding. If it produces no settlement, the case is supposed to go to the League Council. There, as we all know, it may, likewise, fail to be settled. The parties may be reverted to their full and free war-making power as that existed before the League of Nations came into being. No substantial change in this condition has been made by the Security Pact.

It is unfortunate, indeed, that the Locarno jurists have revived the attempt to make vital distinctions in action between what once were called (in a now neglected jargon) "judiciable," "justiciable," or "judicial" or "legal" cases, and "all other" cases of dispute between nations. They have dug a pit for the feet of the signatories.

Let us pass to the treaties between France on the one hand and Poland and Czecho-Slovakia on the other. In these we find, as in the Security Pact, an assertion of right on the part of one signatory to make war on an enemy of the others, without waiting for League action. Two nations are made into one so far as they may choose to fight under certain circumstances. One of them may, indeed, have engaged in a true war of defense—more or less recognized by the Covenant. The other frees itself from the League obligations by undertaking to act upon its own hasty and independent judgment—thus dissolving the League pro tanto. The key to these Declarations of Independence in war making is found in Article 8 of the Security Pact:

The present treaty shall be registered at the League of Nations in accordance with the Covenant of the League. It shall remain in force until the Council, acting on a request of one or other of the High Contracting Parties notified to the other signatory Powers three months in advance, and voting at least by a two-thirds majority, decides that the League of Nations insures sufficient protection to the High Contracting Parties; the treaty shall then cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of one year from such decision.

Now consider, five members of the League declare, by clear inference, that they have not "sufficient protection" through their membership in the League. (I count Germany a member, as all the Locarno treaties are predicated upon her entrance.)

Acting only on the motion of one of these parties, the Council may purge itself of the charge of impotence. There is lip-service to the League in several provisions, but here is the touchstone of faith. In substance, France objects to dependence upon a League guaranty (particularly with Germany as a member) and secures for herself and her supposed friends a right to make war against Germany in the free fashion of pre-League days.

A certain condescension toward the League is shown in several cases in which new procedures are imposed upon the Council by the confident confederates at Locarno. The part dictates to the whole—the Covenant, as applied to the Locarno signatories, is effectively amended without waiting for the slow processes called for by Article 26 of the Covenant.

The League has never been strong, it has a weak constitution, and now it has been bled by the Locarno doctors.

Chairman, N. Y. State Commission on Ventilation*

A volume designed to give in broad outline a clear statement of the modern conception of good ventilation in public buildings, schools, private houses, etc. It presents a new knowledge of ventilation to the physician, engineer, architect or builder, and to all who value, in home or office, comfort, efficiency and health.

The Life of ALBERT R. PARSONS

Published by his widow, LUCY E. PARSONS, 3130 N. Troy Street, Chicago, Illinois.

Beautifully bound and Illustrated. Price $3.00. Postage 15c.

Are you American people ready to learn the truth about the Haymarket Riot, and the judicial murder of the five Labor martyrs, the Chicago Anarchists? Then read "The Life of Albert R. Parsons."

Some of the press comments and reviews of that time: "This is one of the most remarkable books ever printed in America; it is a labor of love and memoir, published by the devoted widow of a martyr."—Woman's Journal, Boston.

"Mrs. Parsons's work has been mainly that of a compiler; but she has performed her task carefully and intelligently."—Chicago Daily News.

"Talk about your Robert Emmet, the heroes of the French Revolution, the great martyrs of past ages . . . but gaze at the awfully sublime heroism of this man, who, with an instinct born only of true manhood, comes of his own free will to the bar of (in)justice and, to satisfy the hungry yells of an infuriated aristocracy, gives himself up to be tried . . . he listens to the perjured testimony of the paid assassins, stands up and is condemned to death—for what? For holding opinions regarding a system of society that he believed to be an improvement over the systems that now tyrannize the people of the earth."—Non-Conformist.

"Mrs. Parsons has done her work well, the motive that has prompted her to attempt the task appeals to every wife-heart."—Mt. Vernon (Ill.) Progressive Farmer.

"Of New England lineage, Albert R. Parsons was a puritan in zeal, courage and enthusiasm, spirituality, and tenacity of principle and purpose. Neither the gloom of the cell nor the shadow of the scaffold could bend or break him. . . . His life was offered him for the asking, but he said he could not ask for that which he had not forfeited. From that resolution friends could not move him. There was a spirituality in his look that revealed a temperament of poetry and dream. The story of Parsons' life magnetizes like the tale of 'The Ancient Mariner.'"—General M. M. Trumbull.

"FAMOUS SPEECHES" of the five Anarchist Martyrs, delivered in court, when sentenced to death, with fine pictures of them and other illustrations. Price $1.00

A TRUCE has been called in the Thirty Years' War between anthracite operators and miners. The truce brings to an end the longest battle to date, allowing the exhausted belligerents to retire to their tents, but the war goes relentlessly on. A compromise has been reached whereby work will be resumed at the old wages. A new scale may be proposed by either side after January 1, next, and if no agreement can be reached by negotiation the question shall be referred to a board of two men, one representing the miners and the other the mine owners. If these two men cannot agree, they may call in a third person as arbitrator, and the decision shall be binding on both parties. The word "may" is interpreted as meaning also "may not," and as it is assumed that neither side will consent to arbitrate a change in wages, these will remain as they are for the period of the contract unless altered by mutual agreement. Provision has been made also for a system of "cooperation and efficiency" through which the miners think they may, by increasing production, gain their demand for the check-off method of collecting union dues, but this part of the arrangement is far from clear. Whatever credit is in order for bringing the truce to pass is somewhat difficult to assess. Some point to the Administration, through the person of Mr. Davis, some to Richard F. Grant of Cleveland, some to Governor Pinchot, while miners and operators say that the settlement was in fact achieved "within the industry."

SO PASSES an intolerable situation and with it an unparalleled opportunity to bring lasting order into the anthracite industry. The crazy patchwork of this new agreement may give us more coal and less smoke for what is left of the winter and lift the gaunt hand of starvation from miners' wives and children. For this surcease we can only breathe a sigh of relief. But one fears the greatest sigh of relief in the country will be the one that rattles the windows of the White House. The strong, silent man who did not break the Boston police strike has been saved by his star again, and can continue to do nothing now happily uninterrupted by outside pressure. Had he chosen to follow the clear path outlined by the Coal Commission of 1922, he would have had not only a grateful country to support him but certainly the enthusiastic indorsement of the miners as well, while many of the operators would undoubtedly have been glad to fall in line. He could have written the peace terms which would have ended, once and for all, the Thirty Years' War. Instead we have a patched-up truce, containing no single constructive element, which will stagger along until the next pitched battle breaks. Will Congress do now what the President has not dared to attempt?

WHENEVER MEXICO does anything which displeases our oil men, or whenever it seems about to do something that will displease them, news spouts from Mexico like an oil gusher. Where all has been serene and peaceful for months, presto, change! Trains are held up, revolutionists plot, bandits become active, property is confiscated, religion is menaced. So naturally we find on the first page of the New York Times of February 12 a hair-raising story declaring that "Mexico will seize church property," that a "nationalization order is issued," that "priests are arrested." The story then pictures sudden and wanton expulsion of priests though "clad in their robes of office and performing religious rites before their congregations . . . without warning, and time was not even allowed them to get their . . . personal effects." This yarn is wholly misleading both in its facts and its implications. There has been no church property in Mexico for over half a century—since the reform laws of Juarez separating church and state. Occasionally church property is found to be illegally and clandestinely held and under these circumstances reverts to the nation. The Constitution of 1917 forbade the ministry of foreign-born clergymen, but the Mexican hierarchy has never seen fit to comply. This law is now being enforced. As to the circumstances surrounding its enforcement a subsequent Times dispatch on February 14 refutes the previous account by revealing that a ten-days' notice had been given to foreign clergymen to cease their professional activities or leave the country.

IT LOOKS as if we should see a remarkable example of a popular referendum on a huge scale. The German Communists and Socialists have united for the first time, in a common demand, that the question whether any moneys shall be paid to the Hohenzollerns by the German republic shall be laid before the voters. In accordance with the Constitution, lists to determine the wishes of the public will be laid before the voters from March 4 to March 17. Should 10 per cent of the number of voters in the last presidential election, approximately 4,000,000, signify their desire to vote on a settlement with the royal princes, then the government would be compelled to submit the issue to a final referendum at which 50 per cent of the voters must vote if it is to be effective. The Socialists and Communists are sure that the 4,000,000 can be obtained. Whether the necessary 20,000,000 will go to the polls in the final test is doubtful. The belief is that if they do the Kaiser and the royal princes will get no compensation whatever. All the imperialists and nationalists and the followers of the Kaiser will probably abstain from going to the polls. In any event, if the Reichstag does not get ahead of the referendum by settling the question itself, we are likely to see an extraordinarily interesting experiment in taking the opinion of the individuals of a great nation.

FRANCE, which in 1914 probably permitted greater freedom in the expression of personal opinion than any other country in the world, gives evidence once every so often that it is still under the cloud of prejudice and bigotry begotten by the war. Thus General Percin, one of the nation's most distinguished soldiers, holder of the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor, has been visited with disgrace because of articles advocating regional home rule for Alsace which he contributed to the press, especially the Zukunft, a separatist newspaper of Strasbourg. General Percin maintains that his scheme is in accordance with the French constitution, but any move toward political liberalism for Alsace is like a red rag to the chauvinist elements of France. Twelve Senators from the reconquered provinces, supported by the reactionary Echo de Paris, accused General Percin of "anti-patriotism" and demanded his punishment by the Legion of Honor. Three penalties for dishonorable conduct are provided by the legion—censure, dismissal, or erasure of the offender's name. General Percin was found to merit the last or extreme penalty by his judges, but owing to his past record and what was offensively characterized as his present senility they recommended some less severe punishment.

FEAR WILL OUT, even though it is the mighty Mussolini in whose breast it lurks. The press carried accounts, detailed to many columns, of his wild speech to Germany, but it gave less than two inches to another story which read as follows:

ROME, Feb. 8 (A. P.)—King Carnival is threatened with death in Rome with the Prefect of Police as his executioner. An edict has been issued forbidding the wearing of masks in streets and public places. Even at private masquerade dances police have the right to demand that wearers of masks identify themselves.

Mussolini blares his defiance to the world in the hall of the Deputies, but he advertises his fear in less noisy but no less certain fashion through his Prefect of Police. For Mussolini is familiar with masquerades, through long experience, and to him every carnival is a potential carnival of death; every mask hides the face of a possible assassin.

THE WIPING OUT of the last war-fraud indictments, coupled with the statement by the Associated Press that all the cases "resulted in favor of the persons accused," has led Mark Sullivan and others to assume that there were practically no war frauds and nothing wrong in connection with the conduct of the war except inevitable waste and minor lapses due to so gigantic an operation. The truth, we believe, lies a long distance from that. We are still of the opinion that gigantic frauds were committed during the war in the aircraft field, in the construction and the conduct of the shipping fleet, in the building of cantonments, in a number of other directions. If the statement of the Associated Press is true—we had thought that a few minor rascals had been caught in the meshes of the law—why then it only signifies the total failure of the prosecuting machinery. For this politics is in considerable part responsible, and so is the Harding administration, which came in with the spirit among many of its members or hangers-on of seeking not to punish anybody but to get Republican feet into the trough immediately. The pages of The Nation bear witness to many of the scandalous facts that are beyond question. No, it falsifies history for anyone to give the war management a clean bill of health. The sad fact is that great malefactors worked their will upon us under the smoke screen of patriotism and of beating the Germans, and have gotten off scot free because of the indifference or inefficiency or deliberate wish of those who should have brought the guilty to book.

NOT ONLY MACHINE-GUNS but tear gas were called in to reinforce justice in Delaware at the trial of a Negro accused of assaulting a 12-year-old white girl. Reports of the size of the crowd about the jail while the trial was in progress are not entirely convincing; but whether one or two or ten thousand persons were there, gas bombs were hurled at them to keep them off, barbed-wire entanglements were thrown around the courthouse, machine-guns were leveled at their heads, and three companies of the National Guardsmen placed themselves between the howling mob and the prisoner. All this is spectacular and overdramatic; but, at least, there was no lynching in Georgetown. The trial, of course, was speedily over; the accused, who was said to have confessed, although he pleaded not guilty, was convicted after a few minutes' deliberation by the jury; and the judge, doing his duty with no less alacrity, sentenced the unfortunate man to hang on February 26, less than five weeks after the crime was committed.

THE PRESIDENTS of Harvard and Johns Hopkins universities within the past year have issued statements concerning the higher learning in America which not only are in agreement but are conspicuously true and timely. We commented not long ago upon the proposal of the president of Johns Hopkins to do away with the first two years of undergraduate work in view of the obvious fact that this could just as well be done in junior colleges comfortably removed from the more serious academic scene. Now the trustees at Baltimore have accepted the proposal; and simultaneously with their resolution comes a declaration by President Lowell of Harvard that freshmen and sophomores are indeed a problem:

Anyone who has taught freshmen is aware that they cannot read books. They can read passages and understand the meaning of particular things when pointed out to them; but they have not the habit of sustained mental self-direction that will enable them to follow the thread of an author's thought for a considerable time.

President Lowell merely laments the necessity, in view of this situation, of high-school methods in college classrooms, and urges that such methods be abandoned as early as possible in the four-year course. He does not go so far as the heads of Johns Hopkins have gone and recommend the abolition of freshmen and sophomores. But Harvard and the other larger universities may come yet to the point where they feel forced, in the interests of dignity and scholarship, to rid themselves of the machinery which does indeed properly belong to the junior college. An extension of the tutorial system and a general examination scheme—measures which President Lowell now strongly urges—are, of course, excellent in themselves, but they can be applied only to mature and independent students, of whom, fortunately, there continue to be a good many in American universities, despite a certain amount of popular tradition to the contrary.

TWO PAMPHLETS have recently come across our desk which for their brevity, clarity, and intelligence place them in a class by themselves. The first has to do with "Our Economic System," the second with "Public Ownership"; both have been prepared by the New York Federation of Progressive Women, 25 West Forty-third Street. There is no denying the fact that they are propaganda in the sense that their authors desire a change in the going structure of industry, but the case is stated with a broadness of vision, a tolerance, a fairness to the arguments of the conservative, and a patness of factual interpolation, which is unique in pamphleteering. If you are a liberal in economic thought who has spent some years in acquiring from scattered and ramifying sources the case for that liberalism, and find that despite much fasting and prayer your conception tends to get fuzzy at the edges, you will welcome the news that these two little documents act like powerful lenses in bringing the case into proportion and focus. Meanwhile, if placed within reach of inquiring youngsters, nothing could conceivably be more destructive to the development of future Coolidges.

THE DEATH OF HENRY HOLT removes one of the most interesting figures in American publishing, and the oldest. Mr. Holt, who was in his eighty-seventh year when he died, had maintained his affection for the world of books until very near the end, though he had not for ten years been actively connected with the firm of Henry Holt and Company. Beginning in his youth with a desire to write, he gradually found his way into the circle of those who publish, and although he is known as the author of a number of volumes, chief among these being the reminiscences which he called "Garrulities of an Octogenarian Editor," he is still better known through the distinguished house which bears his name. It was characteristic of him in his latter days that he should found at seventy-four and conduct for six years a journal devoted to highly controversial subjects. The Unpopular Review, later the Unpartisan Review, was valuable for the opportunities which it offered for the expression of specialized minority opinion; the only reason for its eventual failure was perhaps the fact that it did not represent a single consistent minority, did not become the organ of one intellectual party. In next week's issue The Nation will speak at greater length of the services which Mr. Holt performed as author, editor, and publisher. Meanwhile, it regrets deeply the passing of a genial and broadly experienced man.

The Cathcart Case

IN the case of the Countess of Cathcart the United States has touched bottom in its Pecksniffian policy of supervising the morals of private individuals, particularly those of visitors to this country. Talk about the government having no place in business! It has no place whatever in the field of private morals any more than it has any right to exclude foreigners like the Countess Karolyi for their allegedly "dangerous" opinions. There is no other country in the world that is either so childish or so puritanical, so hopelessly bigoted, so silly as to believe that it must protect the morals of its people by excluding those who have transgressed conventionality or hold to unpopular theories of government.

Let us say at once that we are not interested particularly in the exclusion of the Earl of Craven, with whom the Countess Cathcart once lived for a year, and that we are firmly of the opinion that the Commissioner of Immigration in New York, Mr. Curran, has not only proved himself a donkey in his actions but has clearly perverted the law. Section 19 of the immigration act of February, 1917, says that "any alien . . . who has admitted the commission prior to entry of a crime involving moral turpitude may be excluded after admittance within five years." Neither the Countess nor the Earl of Craven has been guilty of a crime; Congress never contemplated the exclusion of a divorced man or woman in enacting this law. It had in mind criminals as to whose moral delinquency there could be no question. Mr. Curran said he could not help himself because the Countess told the truth in all honesty when she might easily have lied. That is no excuse, for the law plainly does not cover her case. Indeed a federal court has held that "Various lapses from virtue not amounting to prostitution are not such misdemeanors involving moral turpitude as will exclude an alien woman in the absence of proof that any law was violated by her in the commission of such an act."

Innumerable divorced men and women come in and out, and others like Sarah Bernhardt who have openly lived their own lives in defiance of convention are welcome to our shores. When Gaby Deslys came over she was not only not excluded but was especially heralded by the newspapers as the friend of a king. The confessed murderer of Rasputin, who was certainly guilty of a crime involving moral turpitude, was admitted and no one raised the question; we could fill a page of The Nation with similar cases. To put the deciding of intimate moral questions into the hands of political appointees like Mr. Curran, to say whether or not a George Eliot or a peasant Sarah Smith is guilty of moral turpitude under certain circumstances is absurd.

There are plenty of American women whose records are the same as Lady Cathcart's who come and go freely; that is the disgusting part of it. If England and France should take similar action what a mess we should be in! With a country full of divorces for cause, with thousands upon thousands experimenting in the domain of sex, we set ourselves up as holier-than-thou and calmly pass on the private life of temporary visitors. How the Prince of Wales escaped being asked by Mr. Curran if he had always been chaste we cannot understand.

In this case the country's morals are neither safeguarded nor advanced. On the contrary, we bring not only America but all moral standards into contempt.

Bigger and Better Mergers

BIGNESS does not necessarily mean badness. But the experience of the public at large with big business to date has not been a particularly happy one or conducive to many loud huzzas for bigness as such. In fact, the experience has led to the creation of a new demonology with "Wall Street" as the supreme dragon. That demonologies generally do violence to the facts does not obscure the very real causes which brought some millions of people to a point where their indignation forced them to create a demonology.

The past few months have witnessed a widespread and dramatic activity in corporation mergers. Super-trusts have broken out like a rash. The Department of Justice has started suit under the Sherman law against William B. Ward's bread combine and the National Food Products Corporation. The aluminum trust threatens to engulf Niagara Falls; Professor Ripley of Harvard declares that the latest labor-saving devices in high finance have saved the stockholder the labor of voting or of exercising any control whatsoever; while the New York Stock Exchange promises to investigate alphabetical series of non-voting stock. Meanwhile, a bond has been invented and actually issued the principal and interest of which shift with the index number of wholesale prices—thus keeping the holder always on a par with the cost of living. In brief, the financial pot is boiling with unprecedented vigor and business is brisk among the stock and bond houses.

Free competition has seen its day, and over great and growing sections of our industrial life is dying, where it is not completely dead. The logic of business enterprise guided by the goal of maximum profit could not tolerate the duplication, proliferation, excess capacity, and operating waste of unrestricted competition. Soon after the Civil War that logic began to make itself felt in tangible action, and has been accelerating ever since. Against its remorseless demands the Government, actuated by popular outcries, set up the barriers of the Sherman and the Clayton anti-trust acts. Modern industrialism went through these acts like so many sheets of paper, pausing only—by advice of counsel—to change, and quite probably to strengthen, the legal form of its corporate units. Perhaps the net effect of the Sherman law has been to goad lawyers into inventing bomb-proof super-trusts. In brief, legislative fiat has had no effect on the behavior flowing from the logic of consolidation—save, possibly, to quicken it. Even the Federal Trade Commission, while it has stopped many minor abuses and made public many interesting and significant facts from time to time, has never permanently restored competitive conditions in any area where the trend was otherwise. We repeat, free competition, so-called, has had its day, and no power probably exists or in an age of growing mechanization ever will exist to call it back from the tomb.

Which leaves us with combinations on our hands whether we like them or not. Big combinations, and getting bigger. And not only horizontal combinations but vertical ones—controlling a commodity from natural resource to finished product. Furthermore, these combinations tend to fall increasingly under the control of bankers and financiers, leaving the old-line captain of industry—who grew up in the industry—about as moribund as free competition. And, as Professor Ripley has pointed out, the latest model in stock flotation is to let the investing public pay the entire cost of the physical properties acquired, receiving no-par, non-voting stock therefor, while the insiders control and skim the cream without contributing a nickel of investment. Or, as a variation, through wide diffusion of stock ownership, insiders control the company while they hold—in a solid block—say only 20 per cent of the outstanding issue.

But there is nothing particularly heinous in either combinations or control by insiders, per se. In fact, combination, through lower operating costs per unit of output, always carries the possibility of an elimination of waste and lower prices for the consumer. In many branches of industry, modern technical engineering knowledge cannot really get to work without combination—in the sense of large-scale operation. Even centralized control is more efficient, technically speaking, than a swarm of sketchily informed stockholders. Then why all the fuss? Because:

(1) Combinations have not the slightest notion of ever letting a penny of the savings which they make through lower unit costs get into the hands of the ultimate consumer. And, what is worse, if their control is sufficiently dominant, they may be able actually to increase prices.

(2) They may pass in mere size the limit of low-cost operation. The Federal Trade Commission charged the beef trust with being too big and too unwieldy to be efficient.

(3) They tend to destroy initiative in the ranks of the great majority of their employees. They flatten life out for uncountried human beings.

(4) They are bitterly opposed to labor organizations, and are usually in a position to make that opposition effective. The recent coal strike was quite possibly caused and prolonged by the desire of the anthracite trust to smash the union, once and for all.

(5) They are forever meddling in politics, running up legislative back alleys. There is no corner of the public domain which they are not bold enough to ask for—and often they are strong enough to get it. They will probably yet get Tea Pot Dome. Nor can any public interest—giant power, a low tariff, a housing program, a park, sanitary shop conditions—clash with their interests and have much hope of surviving. This is their country, and they sit at the head of the table. In all fairness it should be said, however, that if there is anything left over, they raise no objection to our eating it.

And there we are. We can't get back to free competition—especially in this day when high protective tariffs are a national policy; and we can't get much advantage from the obvious economies of industrial combinations because of the swinish, domineering, and intolerable behavior exhibited by the management of combinations as organized to date.

The facts and tendencies are stated, we hope, fairly. We have no prophecy to make at this time. But if we were Mussolini, we would fix prices of trust products, based on a fair margin above certified operating costs. And if a given trust got too obstreperous, we would take it over at cost less depreciation, and run it ourself.

Even Wall Street Is Sometimes Right

ALMOST any time now we may expect to hear from Washington that the new French Ambassador has begun negotiations for the settlement of his Government's debt to the United States. This time the negotiations will be successful, although they will be concluded on a basis no more favorable to us, or less so, than the terms which we refused last autumn. Since the Caillaux commission came over the House has approved a much less favorable settlement with Mussolini's government, and although there will be opposition in the Senate the arrangement is not likely to be defeated. We will not dare to refuse to republican France what we grant to fascist Italy.

The Nation is not opposing such a settlement. As our readers are aware, we were among the first to come out decidedly in favor of renouncing most of our European war debts as a matter of justice, necessity, and business. Putting it on the lowest grounds, we realized that the major part of this debt neither could nor would ever be paid, and at a moment when America was still regarded as a big brother to the world in general we argued for cancellation in return for various concessions that might have then been obtained in the interest of European stabilization and peace. That opportunity has passed, never to return. In the last few years the friendliness with which America was viewed just after the war has changed into a mountain of hate which will hardly disappear in our generation. All we can do now is to write off our losses. But The Nation proposes to go on telling its readers that our settlements are losses and to refute to the best of its ability the pretense of the Republican Party that promises of payments sixty years, or even ten years hence (entered into virtually under duress), are anything but stage money.

Although the Republican Party is now directly chargeable with the sin of trying to make these debt settlements appear better than they are, almost all of our politicians and most of our newspapers have been singularly lacking in knowledge or vision in their attitude. For instance, we find the New York Times saying of the European war debts on January 29 last:

They might have been made a means of securing goodwill. Instead, they have brought us dislike. They might have been made an aid in inducing European governments to assent to disarmament, to facilitate international trade, to promote everywhere good understandings which would have led to good business. But our Government and people have taken the narrower view. They have gone after the cash and let the credit go. Yet time is pretty sure to demonstrate that this country would have been wiser if it had put a little more shrewd world-politics into its attempts to collect its war debts.

Fine words. But the Times was not speaking out that way five years ago—when The Nation was. In fact only our leading financiers—our much-distrusted men of Wall Street—have been generally right in this matter from the outset. Probably there has been less of justice and mercy in their attitude than of a realization of the hard facts and a desire to turn them to business interest, but the truth remains that they are the only class in the community whose record has been even tolerably intelligent.

Now that France is the only nation of consequence with which we have not made a debt agreement—and since her case is in many ways the most important of all—it is not amiss to remind our readers that the French Government is engaged in a most difficult and desperate attempt to balance its budget. The maneuvers in Parliament are full of cheap politics and personal chicanery—just as are the actions of our Administration and Congress on all questions great or small. But perhaps for the first time since the war the French people seem to be roused to the necessity of heroic and immediate measures if they are to save their financial fabric from utter ruin. We are of the opinion that they need every sou they can raise for use at home and should not attempt to pay any of their debt to us at this time. At any rate we should grant most lenient terms.

There is an important aspect of this question, too, which is not in the least understood in the United States. If any party or administration in this country should propose to redeem our Liberty bonds at twenty cents on the dollar, while paying some foreign creditor in full, there would be a tempest which would blow the scheme into immediate oblivion. Yet that is precisely what most Americans are asking of the present French Government. The French franc, formerly worth almost twenty cents, now brings in the markets of the world less than four. It will never go back to par. The only possible way in which France can pay her internal debts and balance her budget is with a franc that is worth as little or less than the present one. In other words she must permanently and irrevocably repudiate at least 80 per cent of her home debt (including internal bonds held by Americans and other foreigners). If Frenchmen themselves are obliged to accept 20 per cent in settlement of their claims against their government, is there any reason why the United States should expect more?

Senator Smoot Weeps

“MR. PRESIDENT, the pending revenue bill represents quite a remarkable record of achievement.” With this sententious remark Senator Smoot introduced to the Senate his prodigy of financial legislation. His speech is so useful a record of the way the conventional senatorial mind works in matters financial that we wish it might have a very careful reading in the widest circles. At the outset he put his best foot to the fore and declared that 2,350,100 persons would be relieved by his bill of the direct burden of income taxes. Without troubling about such a minor detail as producing evidence that these figures were correct, the Senator next dropped a Walrus-tear over this very emancipation of which he was so proud. Said he: “In one respect this is unfortunate. Anyone who is a taxpayer is bound to have a closer feeling of interest in his government, its policies and activities, than under the situation where the burden of expense is borne by others.” Indeed, as he pondered on the plight into which he was just engineering his beloved republic he waxed indignant: “I am opposed to calling this a ‘government of the people, by the people, and for the people,’ and then denying to all the people the privilege of contributing toward the maintenance of their government. A reduction in the tax burden is quite a different matter from the entire denial of the privilege of contribution.” Then, like Lewis Carroll's Walrus, he held a handkerchief before his streaming eyes and resolutely denied to the alleged 2,350,100 of his fellow-citizens their birthright. What a patriot; what a martyr to duty!

Now, as everyone knows, Senator Smoot dislikes a fuss; but if there is to be one he is always careful to have it known that the Republican Party is never to blame. Hence his useful handkerchief appeared once more: "There will be much said during the debates on this bill about taking the tax off the rich, about special interests and other topics common of easy and popular discussion. So far as criticism is in vogue, it will be directed necessarily against both of the great political parties, which in this bill meet in their views of sound economics." The Democrats in the nearly empty Senate chamber squirmed, and one made as if to rise and speak. The tearful Mr. Smoot courteously stopped. The Democrat faded away. What could he say?

Then Senator Smoot rose to great economic heights:

The reduction of the higher surtaxes is based on a ground of sound economics that looks further than to the interest of any individual or group. The latter is a minor and unimportant consideration as compared with the real reason that is at the basis of this policy, upon which both of the great political parties find themselves in accord. The 5,000 individuals who enjoy the incomes in excess of $100,000 can neither eat food nor wear clothes to any greater degree beyond the wants of all other human beings. They may secure greater security, but their capacity for expenditure is limited.

Then the Senator added still another reason for letting off the high tax-payer—it is "utterly impossible to compel a man to pay more of a tax than he feels that he in good conscience should pay."

How sad it is for Senator Smoot, that having laid down the exact economic laws and the only correct financial policy, his fellow-Senators should decide to have more of such a good thing and calmly cut off another $230,000,000 of our taxes. No wonder his handkerchief came to light again—only this time the tears were real.

The King's English

IT is evident to every student of language that a revolt against the grammarians is under way. It was not until the nineteenth century that their right to control the language was generally accepted, and now, after enjoying a century-long dictatorship, they are being gradually compelled to give up their usurped authority and to recognize the fact that usage makes rules, not rules usage. A generation ago the American philologist, Richard Grant White, chortled over the long list of "blunders" in the use of "shall" and "will" which he had discovered in the works of such writers as Cowley, Steele, Addison, Swift, Burke, Landor, and Sydney Smith; today, on the other hand, a considerable number of persons recognize that the joke was on him and not upon his authors; for if such writers habitually violate the rules, then obviously the rules, and not the writers, are wrong.

Just as only theologians knew enough about the text of the Bible to demonstrate the absurdity of giving absolute authority to a literal interpretation of it, so only grammarians know enough about grammar to show how unfounded is its pretended authority; but, fortunately, the grammarians are joining the liberal cause just as the theologians did, a fact illustrated anew by an admirable article called The Periphrastic Future with Shall and Will, by Charles C. Fries, in the December number of the Publications of the Modern Language Association. Mr. Fries, struck by the voluminous confusion of the rules upon the subject under discussion, undertook an elaborate investigation which involved the study of all the available English grammars (forty-six in number) published before the nineteenth century, as well as a still more laborious investigation of actual usage as revealed in the dialogue of the English drama. His results are startling to those who have wasted time over such elaborate discussions of the correct usage of these two words as is found in supposedly authoritative modern works like Fowler and Fowler's "The King's English."

Mr. Fries proves (1) that until 1632 there is no evidence that grammarians recognized any distinction between the two words, a fact which, by the way, indicates that Shakespeare and the translators of the Bible got along without it; (2) that the distinction first appears in an English grammar written by a Frenchman in French for the purpose of teaching his countrymen the language; (3) that it was not a common feature of English and American grammars until after the first quarter of the nineteenth century; (4) that at no time up to and including the present has usage justified the formal rules.

As everybody knows, English grammar was first formulated by men who had been trained in Latin and who wished to give to the vulgar tongue the dignity supposed to be inherent in a codified system. After the common habit of specialists, they delighted in complexities and they acknowledgedly based their rules not upon the language as it was spoken or written but upon their conception of how, in the interest of logic, consistency, or "right reason" it ought to be spoken or written. Now as the scientific gradually replaced the logical study of language it came to be recognized that usage alone determined correctness, but the new grammarians took over the rules of the older ones without sufficiently examining their origin and so it happens that today men who theoretically accept usage as the final arbiter of correctness nevertheless accept rules which did not have and did not claim for themselves this authority of usage.

It is a pity perhaps that the pedantry of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries cannot be overturned except at the cost of labor as arid in itself as is that of such men as Mr. Fries, but the fact remains that the average man has an exaggerated respect for the formal externals of education, that he tends to measure his own and others' education by ability to spell conventionally and speak by the rule, and that he will never be comfortable in following usage in such matters as the employment of "shall" and "will" until the grammarians tell him that he ought to do so.

Thus grammarians must undo the evil which grammarians have done. They invented their complexities partly in order to have something to teach, but children today have too much to learn to waste time upon subjects which have no real existence outside of textbooks. A certain minimum of grammatical knowledge is necessary on the part of the users of any language if it is to be kept exact, comely, and universally comprehensible, but the textbooks of the schools contain more than this necessary minimum. Correct usage is learned by imitation, not by rules, and to teach elaborate formal rules is to rob the child (and the man) of the opportunity to learn things which would be really fruitful materially or spiritually. For three centuries grammarians have been engaged upon what is called "constructive" work; today their duty is, like that of workers in various other fields of knowledge, chiefly to destroy what their fore-runners have built and built so badly.

Commercial Aviation in Europe

By EARL W. ELHART

COMMERCIAL aviation in Europe today is an industry that violates all accepted principles of profit and loss and yet curiously continues to expand. A growing network of air lines now covers the north of Europe, carrying thousands of passengers and tons of freight. All this is being done in spite of the fact that commercial aviation has never been profitable in the past, is now operating at a loss, and holds no prospect for improvement in the immediate future.

Commercial aviation in Europe is a state ward, rationed in part from the public treasury through subsidies. Regardless of profit and loss, aviation is recognized as a new means of transportation which has practically reduced Europe to one-third of its former size; the airplane carries mail and passengers at almost triple the speed of the best express train.

In 1920 Europe was faced with the alternative of supporting commercial aviation by government aid or abandoning the industry to almost certain bankruptcy. Without exception, the governments recognized that a thriving aircraft industry, in addition to being highly valuable commercially, would provide an essential factor in the national-defense system. Every important state came to the rescue with substantial subsidies and in this way made possible the growing commercial aviation industry. In all of Europe there are no unsubsidized lines in operation. The British subsidy law provides for the payment of £1,000,000 over a period of ten years, the Dutch K. L. M. line receives a lump sum of 300,000 guilders each year, and French civil aviation last year received 77,000,000 francs from the government treasury. No accurate figures are available for the German subsidy, as government mileage subsidies are augmented by state and municipal payments. Even the Dutch K. L. M. lines, considered to be among the most efficiently managed in Europe, earn scarcely more than 50 per cent of expenses. Statistics regarding operating costs and income are in all countries jealously guarded. Even the official figures cannot be taken at their face value. In 1924 it was estimated that 90,000 passengers were carried by air in all Europe, with nearly double that number in 1925. These figures include, however, a large number of officials as well as other non-paying passengers carried for advertising purposes and often to meet subsidy requirements. Passengers traveling from one country to another are often counted at both terminals. Figures obtained from different sources show wide discrepancies on the volume of traffic handled.

The real accomplishment of Europe cannot be gauged alone by statistics. The present and potential value of the lines is much beyond the number of passengers and tons of mail and freight carried. Today regular services are in operation throughout Europe, flying and ground personnel are being trained and facilities developed, the "air traveling habit" is being cultivated; in brief, a solid foundation for a working system of air transportation is being built up.

Old-fashioned Europe can give the United States lessons in speed. At 9:30 every morning a plane leaves Tempelhof Field in Berlin for Amsterdam, arriving at 2:30. Through passengers leave an hour later, arriving in London that evening at 6:30 or in Paris at 7 o'clock. The elapsed time between Berlin and London is nine hours; between Berlin and Paris, nine and one-half. Fastest railroad time from Berlin to London is twenty-two hours; from Berlin to Paris twenty hours. You leave Moscow at 7 in the morning, arrive at Königsberg at 6 that evening in time to take the night train which arrives in Berlin the next morning. This brings the Soviet capital within thirty-six hours of London or Paris as compared with three days by rail. Paris today is but a daylight trip to Vienna by plane; Belgrade is eight hours further by air, and Constantinople an additional eight hours. In the absence of night flying, Constantinople is three days from Paris as compared to five days by rail. Night flying, however, will soon reduce this to thirty-six hours or less. Helsingfors, Copenhagen, Moscow, Warsaw, Prague, Vienna, Budapest, Belgrade, and Constantinople are all directly connected by air with Berlin, Paris, and London. Indeed, after April 1 next Moscow and London will be only 24 hours apart according to a Berlin dispatch of January 13.

What have been the accomplishments of France in the last five years? She has now nine lines in operation, of which two in Africa have been established within the last half year. The busiest of all the French commercial airways is the Paris-London line, which is much used by American tourists. During the three busiest summer months as many as fifty passengers a day are often carried. The Paris-Brussels-Amsterdam line is also popular. The fare to Brussels has been made very low, being equivalent to a first-class railroad fare. The Paris-London ticket costs $30, a $10 advance over last year.

The most important of the other French lines are to the East and South. Regular services operate between Paris, Zürich, Prague, and Warsaw with the trunk line running east to Vienna, Budapest, Belgrade, Bucharest, Constantinople, and even Angora. The Bucharest-Constantinople division, however, is not regularly operated. In general France maintains business-like air services with the whole of Eastern Europe. In the south, she has developed regular lines to her African possessions. One of the oldest and best-established services runs from Toulouse along the coast of Spain to Casablanca in Africa. The extension of this line to Dakar is for the present a weekly service. A branch operates from Alicante in Spain across the Mediterranean Sea to Algiers. Another line operates three times a week from Antibes to Tunis. The traffic on the African lines consists normally of mail and colonial officials, but during the past year the service has been much used by army officials traveling to and from the Moroccan front. At the present time there is no air connection between Paris and Toulouse, the French terminal of the African lines. The night express from Paris, however, reaches Toulouse in time to take the plane at 5:30 in the morning.

The principal French airdrome, located at Le Bourget, nine miles outside of Paris, is one of the best in all Europe. The spacious hangars and the auxiliary buildings are of fireproof construction, the field has concrete runways for the planes and an excellent meteorological station as well as facilities for restaurants, passengers, post and customs officers. France has the most complete weather-forecasting service in Europe and planes in flight receive regular reports from an airport on fog and storm conditions ahead. On the flight from Le Bourget to London, for instance, a pilot will brave heavy fogs over the Channel, knowing that clear weather exists beyond the highlands of the coast. The French commercial air fleet of 135 planes is second only to that of Germany. The traffic today demands large, reliable, multi-motored machines, which are replacing the small, single-motored planes.

Germany not only leads Europe in commercial aviation but is the only country outside of Russia that operates intra-state lines. With the exception of these two countries, European air services run only between capitals. Treaty difficulties have prevented Germany from developing air connections with the Allied Powers, practically forcing her to concentrate on internal lines and airways to the north and east. Berlin is today the hub of a system of airlines radiating to every large city in Germany and the Baltic and Scandinavian countries. Six and twelve passenger planes leave daily for Königsberg, connecting with the Russian line to Moscow, the trunk service continuing north to the Baltic cities of Riga, Reval, and Helsingfors. Lines run southeast to Dresden and will continue to Prague and the Balkans as soon as arrangements can be made with Czecho-Slovakia. Another daily line runs to Leipzig, Stuttgart, and on to Switzerland. Western lines cover the Ruhr district and connect with Berlin, Hamburg, and Bremen and extend on to Amsterdam, where connections are made with London and Paris. In the south of Germany lines connect Munich, Stuttgart, Frankfurt, and the other large cities both with Berlin and with Hamburg and Bremen, as well as with Vienna and Budapest. Services also run to Copenhagen, Stockholm, and Amsterdam. Germany also has the distinction of having the only night-mail line running in Europe today. The plane leaves Berlin at 10 o'clock in the evening and arrives in Malmö, Sweden, at dawn in time to catch the express which arrives in Stockholm at 7 in the morning. This development has taken place in spite of the fact that the Council of Ambassadors has restricted the German companies both in the size of the planes built and the horse-power of the motors.

Within Germany an excellent system of airdromes and landing fields has been developed. The Tempeldorf Field on the outskirts of Berlin compares well with any of the other great airdromes of Europe. The city owns 55 per cent of the field, the remainder being owned jointly by the recently amalgamated Junkers and Aero Lloyd companies. The meteorological station at the field prepares complete charts for the whole of Europe on storm centers and weather conditions. A big radio station at this field is in touch with all of the big cities of the Continent and England. For the night-flying route to Copenhagen lighted landing fields are located every twenty-five kilometers.

Austrian air lines are largely part of the French system in Eastern Europe, although there is one German line. Vienna is connected by the French lines with Zürich, Paris, and London on the west, with the Balkans and Constantinople to the southeast, with another branch running to Warsaw. The line of communication to the Baltic is carried through from Warsaw by a Polish line to Danzig, where connections are made with the German trunk line.

A German line connects Vienna with Munich and makes possible speedy service with other German cities, Holland, and Scandinavia. In all there were seven local lines, operating thirteen planes, in operation in Austria during 1925.

Russia is the only country outside of Germany which has developed intra-state commercial aviation extensively. The disorganized condition of the railroads and the tremendous distances make Russia an ideal land for the development of commercial aviation. It is some two thousand miles from Archangel on the White Sea to Baku on the Caspian and six thousand miles from Moscow to Vladivostok. Air lines here would cut down train time to one-fifth or one-sixth. Russia is not lagging behind other countries. The Moscow-Königsberg line has been in operation since 1922. The red-painted planes leave Moscow every day for Königsberg, where connections are made with the German lines. In August of last year the completion of the first million kilometers of flight on this complete Berlin-to-Moscow line was celebrated in both capitals. From Moscow two lines run south to Rostov, Tiflis, and Baku. In 1922 a weekly post service by air was established connecting Moscow and Leningrad and in 1924 this was made a daily line. One local line is also in operation east of the Urals and another in Siberia. Proposed lines, totaling 12,000 kilometers, have been laid out by the government, to be opened as rapidly as possible, connecting important cities in Siberia as well as in European Russia.

The commercial air lines of Holland must always be international in scope, since the country is itself so small. Up to the present regular air lines have been extended to Brussels, Paris, London, Copenhagen, and Hamburg. Holland has but one important air-transportation company, the K. L. M. lines. This company is now operating two regular daily lines, one running from Amsterdam to Rotterdam and Paris and the other from Amsterdam to Rotterdam and London. With the cooperation of the Danish company, the D. S. L., service is maintained with Bremen, Hamburg, and Copenhagen. Amsterdam has become one of the busiest airports of the Continent, being the terminus and transfer-point for French, English, German, Swiss, and Danish lines. Today Amsterdam is to commercial aviation what Rotterdam was to the shipping industry in former times. It serves as a distribution center for passengers and mail for such distant points as Helsingfors, Moscow, Warsaw, and Constantinople. The K. L. M. fleet in 1925 consisted of eighteen Fokker planes, mostly carrying twelve passengers.

The British air problem is distinctly different from that of continental countries, as there is little competition in time between the slow-moving water traffic in and out of England as compared with the direct and rapid air service. Traveling time from London to Paris by express train and boat is seven hours, by air two and three-quarters hours. On the other hand, short distances and fast-train service within England have made competition by air impracticable and there are no intra-state lines operating today. The three international lines in operation today connect London with Amsterdam, Paris, and Zürich. These are only the first links, however, in the proposed English international air service. It is planned that English lines shall eventually run to her possessions in the Near East and the Orient. The British lines are operated by a single company, the Imperial Airways, formed in the spring of 1924 with government aid to take over the three competing and insolvent lines then in operation. Since the consolidation traffic has greatly increased, but with little progress in operation. English airmen complain that commercial aviation is in the hands of bankers who are primarily interested in profits. The subsidy law requires that 1,000,000 miles be flown annually, but as planes operate at a loss company directors refuse to exceed this minimum because further operations would decrease earnings. This explains why little increase in facilities or equipment has followed the gain in traffic. Up to 1925 all planes in operation were four or more years old, and last year but three modern machines were added, mainly because of the competition of the Dutch and French lines.

The smaller countries of Europe are either operating or planning lines. Poland has one service running from Warsaw to Danzig. Finland and Sweden operate a joint line from Helsingfors to Stockholm. Esthonia plans a line from Reval to Leningrad. Switzerland has one line operating from Zürich to Geneva with irregular service to Lyon, France. Belgium has one line running from Brussels to Bâle, Switzerland. Italy has had lines planned since 1920, but they still remain paper projects.

Two salient facts stand out in European commercial aviation. First, commercial air lines are in actual operation, the volume of traffic is steadily increasing, and everywhere additional services are being planned or put into operation. Second, commercial lines cannot be operated without state aid, barring some revolutionary invention or discovery. It remains to be seen whether commercial aviation will be further developed and supported by a continuation of the subsidy system or whether European governments will, as has been the case with the railways, take over and operate the air lines.

[This is the third and final instalment of Tolstoi's letters to the Hungarian writer, Eugen Heinrich Schmitt. These letters, hitherto unpublished, were written in German; they were received between the years 1894 and 1910. The first two instalments appeared in our issues of February 10 and 17.]

Moscow, November 5, 1896

DEAR FRIEND:

I presume that you have received my letter by this time. Your latest with No. 4 of Ohne Staat I received yesterday. Your essay, The Practicability of Anarchy, is very fine, especially the comparison with the robbers. Nothing can be said against that. But the article does not correspond to the title: the practicability of the idea is not proved, although it may be proved. That is a task which I should like to undertake. That you and your publication are persecuted is not at all surprising, it would be surprising were this not so, were the government not to take every possible means to hinder your activities. But persecution cannot prevail against the truth. Even though your periodical were forced to suspend publication, the idea would persist and find ways of dissemination which would be safer and deeper.

At all events I am convinced that you will not lose courage. Such truths as you promulgate, truths such as that no Christian can be a soldier—that is to say no murderer and no servant of an institution which is based upon force and murder—are indisputable, so simple, and so incontrovertible that no discussion, no furnishing of proofs, no specious eloquence are necessary. In order that mankind may make these truths their own it is only necessary to repeat them without cessation, so that the majority may hear and understand them.

Truths such as that which declares that no Christian can participate in murder, that he cannot serve the state or accept pay which has been extorted from the poor by force through the leaders of organized murder, are, as I have said, elemental and incontestable, and all who hear them must agree with them. In cases in which one who has perceived these truths still persists in acting contrary to them, he does so only because he is accustomed to act contrary to them, because he finds it difficult to master himself, and because the majority acts as he acts, for which reason disobedience to this great law does not entail the loss of respect of those whom he himself respects.

The same thing happens in the case of vegetarianism. "Man is able to live and remain healthy without killing animals for his sustenance. Consequently in eating meat he aids in the slaughter of animals and serves only the pleasure of his palate. To act thus is to act immorally." This, too, is a plain and self-evident truth; who would be so bold as to deny it? But as most men are still addicted to eating meat, they reply laughingly, after having heard such arguments and understood them too, that after all a juicy beefsteak is an excellent thing and that they would be glad to devour one for dinner.

The same attitude is now adopted by officers and officials in the face of the arguments advanced to prove that military and state services are incompatible not only with Christianity but with the very idea of humanity. "Of course you are quite right in your attitude," says the state official, "nevertheless it is very agreeable to wear a uniform and epaulettes, for these give us the entree everywhere and create respect for us. And it is still more agreeable to be independent of all eventualities and to draw one's salary promptly on the first of every month. Yes, your ideas are no doubt quite correct. Nevertheless I shall endeavor to get my supplementary pay and then my pension."

"Yes, your ideas are no doubt quite proper!" cries the meat-eater, "but first of all, the ox need not be killed with our own hands, since that has already been attended to. Nor need one collect the taxes with one's own hands, since these have already been collected. And one can also do military service without killing human beings with one's own hands. Moreover the majority of human beings have never heard of these disquisitions and have no idea that it is evil to do these things. And so one is able to exist without being forced to give up beefsteaks, and all the pleasant things which the wearing of a uniform implies, such as decorations and especially that safe and secure monthly salary. And as to what may yet come—well, we shall see what we shall see."

The whole thing depends upon the fact that men have never heard the truths which disclose to them the whole iniquity and injustice of their lives. "Carthago delenda est." And Carthage will fall—of that there is no doubt. I do not say that the state will vanish and its power be no more. These things will not vanish so quickly—there are still too many brutal elements in the masses which help to maintain these powers—but the Christian supports of the state are being destroyed, that is to say, the men in power will be forced to cease protecting their authority with the sanctified name of Christianity. Men of brute force will be called men of brute force and nothing else. And as soon as this consummation takes place it will become impossible for them to take shelter under the cloak of pseudo-Christianity, and this will gradually bring about the end of the entire reign of brute force. Let us strive to our utmost to bring about this end! "Carthago delenda est!" The state is violence, Christianity is long-suffering, non-resistance, love. It is for this reason that the state cannot be Christian, for this reason, too, a man who wishes to be a Christian cannot serve the state. There can be no Christian state. A Christian cannot serve the state. A Christian state is a contradiction in terms. "Carthago delenda est!"

DEAR FRIEND:

I have just received a letter from Vandever. His address is as follows: J. R. Vandever, Middelbourg, Holland. He is now in prison in Middelbourg for his repudiation of military service. He is a man of powerful convictions and great talent as I am able to see from his letter and from the speech which he delivered to a socialist society this year. I am writing to him and would like to send him the article about the Dukhobors. Will you please do this, if it be possible? Your monthly would, I believe, be most welcome to him, though he professes agnosticism, which is, as in most cases, due to a misunderstanding.

I believe you must by this time have received my last letter. I am awaiting your answer.

DEAR FRIEND:

I am sending along a short article of mine to accompany the paper upon the Dukhobors. I can add only this—nothing more. The important thing is that one get a proper perspective of the matter abroad—especially in Germany. I have no belief whatever in subscriptions and financial help. A few days ago my friends Tchertskov and Biriukov who had both tried to intercede for the Dukhobors with the government at St. Petersburg were exiled, the one (Tchertskov) to foreign lands, the other to a small town in the Baltic provinces.

I have received your letters and No. 4 [sic] of Ohne Staat (Without a State)—it is possible that the others have also arrived but as I am not in Moscow but in the country I have not received them. I am delighted that you should be so energetically at work. Your articles are very powerful, but forgive me, dear friend, for saying that I should like to see a little less pride and more Christian modesty, more humility.

"Resurrection" is a novel which I had begun long ago and almost completed last year, but I feel that the work is so feeble and bad and useless that I shall under no circumstances allow it to be published.

Ever your friend in brotherly affection,

DEAREST FRIEND:

It is a very great joy to me to receive and to read your letter and the newspaper in which your trial is described. I did not expect that you would be acquitted. It is, as you say, a sign that the time is ripe; but seen from another point of view it is wonderful and also sad to realize that in a country like Hungary where you have every opportunity to propagate your ideas the truth should find so few supporters. It is customary especially here in Russia to believe that only the government is to blame that the truth is not accepted by all men; but in your country in which speeches such as you made can be delivered in court, and to a still greater degree in France, America, and England, where still greater freedom prevails, it is easy to see that the greatest enemy of truth resides not in the government but in the worldly—anti-Christian—teachings of churchly pseudo-Christendom, and of the materialistic-atheistic-socialistic Weltanschauung which gives people whose manner of life is destroyed by the truth a shelter and a defense. It is against these two demons that we must wage war, and we must take great care not to enter upon compromises with either the one or the other. I see that you are carrying on the war with great courage and fervor and it gives me great joy to know this.

How are things with your monthly? Are you still publishing it?

If you have some extra copies of the German newspaper could you not send some of them to the following addresses:

Paul Biriukov, Bausk, Courland, Russia.

Ivan Tregubov, Goldingen, Courland, Russia.

Dimitry Chilkov, Weissenstein, Esthonia, Russia.

DEAR FRIEND:

I have added certain words in red pencil and have also crossed out some passages, and some that did not seem to me to be well translated I have marked with a cross. I no longer have the Russian original at hand so that I am unable to restore point No. 1. If you are not able to replace the missing words from the Dutch version then please cross out this entire passage. The titles are very good and the whole translation most excellent, clear and fine.

I hope that you will be completely acquitted and that you will be so kind as to give me news about the entire trial.

I shall be very happy to receive your publication which I have not seen for a long time.

DEAR FRIEND:

I received your letter and the six or seven copies of Ohne Staat. I am very happy to see that your activities are undiminished and that you are winning more and more supporters, especially among the workmen and are drawing them away from the fraud of socialism. I am particularly pleased with your article The Crisis of Anarchism. Yes, the Christian Weltanschauung must be instilled into mankind in a clear and simple manner. That is the most important thing. It was not Proudhon but Christ who said: "Ye are Gods." But He did not only say this, for his whole teachings are nothing else than the recognition of human dignity, based on the truth that man is the son of God.

The Reactionaries at Work is also very good.

With hearty greetings,

DEAR FRIEND:

I am sending you certain pages of the translation which I have looked through so that there may be no delay. I also hope to have the others ready very soon and to send them on. The preface of the publisher is necessary in all circumstances. Shkarvan or Makovizky would be able to write it. The translation is very good. The changes which I have made you may or may not accept although in some cases they seem to me to be necessary. I hope to answer your questions later. I am too busy now.

With heartiest thanks for your translation and your letter,

DEAR FRIEND:

I received your book² and thank you heartily for it. I have looked through it only superficially so far, but it seems to me that it would be impossible to present my Weltanschauung in a better, more exact, and clearer form.

I would have read it through more carefully in order to give you my opinion upon it, but one of my friends has borrowed it and has not so far sent it back.

The review of your book which you sent me seems to me to be very good. I am most pleased to know that you are working on in the same old spirit and with the same courage. The older one grows the clearer and the more incontrovertible becomes one's conviction that the only meaning of life is the fulfilment of the will of God. This is something which is really full of joy, something that is sure of the greatest success.

Farewell, my dear friend and brother,

DEAR FRIEND:

I am extremely sorry that I can not fulfil the wish of Dr. Hugo Gaw. My bodily powers are still so feeble after my illness and it seems to me that I have still so much that I must finish before the end that I cannot permit myself to begin anything new. It would appear that your letter containing the article upon me did not reach me, or perhaps the letter came during the worst period of my illness and it was simply not given to me.

In any case I thank you for the letter and for the article, for I am convinced that everything that you write about me is right, as it needs must be since you have the same Weltanschauung as mine and are imbued with the same ideas as myself. The proof of this is your beautiful book which I have read with the greatest pleasure and satisfaction. Your letters give me great joy. I hope that I shall be granted this happiness on many future occasions.

I am overjoyed, my dear friend, that I am able to fulfil your wish. My friend Alexander Dunaev (Moscow, the Torgowoi Bank, is his address) is sending you 300 rubles with the next post. The money does not really belong to me. It is a part of the money which I have intended for the Dukhobors from the sales of "Resurrection." The Dukhobors, who are now in Siberia, can make good use of the money and that is why I am keeping it at the bank. In case you should not need the money any longer when February arrives will you please be so kind as to return it to Mr. Dunaev?

I hope with all my heart that you will be rid of your difficulties as soon as possible and that you will be able to work for the good cause in your usual quiet and efficient manner.

DEAR FRIEND:

Your new book, like all your other books, gave me great pleasure. It was not only your presentation of the significance and meaning of life on pages 41 and 52 which afforded me such delight but also the last pages in which, in the very face of our self-conscious civilization, you write so adventurously regarding the possibility of the bulk of mankind returning to an agricultural form of life. It pleased me very much to learn how you were faring and to know that we still are very close to each other in our points of view and that you are engaged in furthering the same work that I am doing.

I remain your loving

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER:

Please forgive me for keeping you waiting so long for an answer to your letter and for an acknowledgment of the receipt of your book. I have been afflicted of late with a most extraordinary weakness of the memory. This is the chief cause of my negligence.

As I had got in touch with you through Shkarvan I took up your book, "Religious Teachings for the Young," once more. I cut the leaves to the middle and read it again with the greatest attention. I will give you my honest opinion about it.

The first chapter Regarding the Truth of the Fables up to the beginning of the story of Christ did not especially please me, as I found nothing new in the first parts. But the following chapters I read with great joy and approval: The Sermon on the Mount

The Miraculous Feeding of the Multitude

Where Does God Throne? (very good)

Our Concern for Our Bodily and Spiritual Life (very good)

The Parable of the Sower (very good: also the story of the seed which chokes the weeds of hair-splitting pedantry is excellent and entirely new)

The Parable of the Talents (good, although the rendition of the contents is too daring)

The Unfaithful Husbandman of Jesus and the Woman Taken in Adultery (very good)

The Last Supper (somewhat artificial, better not meddle with it)

The Story of Christ's Sufferings (very good)

As a whole I believe this book and its circulation will be most useful quite apart from its intrinsic value.

Has the book met with success?

In all love and esteem,

Your friend

DEAR FRIEND:

I am most thankful to you for your kind willingness. I hereby beg you to read in Berlin the report which I had prepared for the Peace Congress of Stockholm.

I did not write you about this in my former letter because I first wished to learn your answer to Shkarvan.

The interpretation of my views in your article pleases me very much even though it was incomplete. Not you are to blame for this, but I. It is particularly agreeable to me to find that the interpretation of my views in this article agreed completely with your own. I am very happy in this unity of our opinions upon all basic principles.

I thank you again for your friendly letter and await with great interest the appearance of the same pamphlet with your foreword.

The Anti-Saloon League's Lost Virtue

By W. G. CLUGSTON

[The conditions described in the following article were made the basis of a resolution introduced in Congress on February 13 by Representative Fred A. Britten of Illinois, demanding a congressional investigation of the Anti-Saloon League. In addition to charges of corruption in Kansas, Mr. Britten asserts, according to press reports, that large sums of money have been used by the Anti-Saloon League to control elections and to pay professional organizers and lobbyists; that the league has openly violated the national campaign-contributions law and the corrupt-practices law; that it paid the campaign expenses of Andrew J. Volstead while he was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary; that it has attempted to influence federal judicial appointments and the selection of federal enforcement agents, and has attempted to influence the President of the United States in his appointments of heads of departments.]

THE Anti-Saloon League has been put in the ditch with another blow-out. This time it is not in wet, wicked New York that the dry crusading organization has been brought to grief; but in Kansas—pure, prohibition Kansas.

Nor has the calamity been brought about by the enemies of aridity. Dr. John G. Schaibly, a Methodist minister who has been engaged in prohibition work for many years, is the man who exposed the rotten conditions in the Kansas branch of the national organization; and Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, coeditor of the Christian Herald and internationally known as an advocate of prohibition, was so appalled by the misuse of the organization as shown by Dr. Schaibly that he issued a public appeal to the churches of Kansas to close their doors to the Anti-Saloon League.

Fred L. Crabbe, who was superintendent of the Kansas Anti-Saloon League for more than five years and who has one brother working in a similar capacity in Maryland and another brother serving as the dry Attorney General of Ohio, has been ousted from his position as superintendent and is now facing disbarment charges which have been filed with the Kansas board of law examiners. Also, Attorney General C. B. Griffith and former Attorney General Richard J. Hopkins, who is now a justice of the Kansas Supreme Court, have been directly involved in the charges made by Dr. Schaibly. Messrs. Hopkins and Griffith have attained their Kansas political prominence largely through their prohibition-enforcement activities and Justice Richard J. Hopkins is a member of the executive committee of the national Anti-Saloon League and has been prominent in its councils for a number of years.

Misuse of thousands of dollars of league funds; juggling of funds contributed by church congregations and private citizens who sought to aid in law enforcement; collection of funds under false pretenses and false statements as to the purposes for which the money was to be used; payment of personal and political obligations out of the league treasury; and the payment of large sums to State officials who were using the league for personal and political purposes are some of the startling revelations that have been made by Dr. Schaibly.

Complaints about the management of the league under the superintendency of Crabbe became so numerous that the headquarters committee was finally forced to institute an investigation and dismiss Crabbe. Dr. Schaibly was chosen to succeed him, and immediately began to try to clean up the mess left by the dismissed superintendent. However, so many obligations were brought to light that he was unable to meet them, and when he insisted upon a public accounting and a thorough straightening out of the irregularities the headquarters committee, under the spokesman-ship of Justice Richard J. Hopkins, informed him he either would have to keep quiet or give up his job. Dr. Schaibly chose to give up his job.

Before doing so, however, Dr. Schaibly had photographic copies made of canceled checks and check stubs showing that Attorney General Griffith had drawn approximately $3,000 from the league treasury during the time he was drawing a regular salary from the State for law enforcement. The photographs of these records show that Griffith was paid a regular salary of $100 a month by the league and that he also drew numerous checks for "expenses," for "law enforcement," and for "attorney fees." Similar photographs show that Supreme Court Justice Hopkins, during the same period, drew $1,191.54 from the league treasury and that he was at the same time drawing a salary from the State. Records were produced to show that league funds were used to pay political campaign bills of both Griffith and Hopkins, and then photographic copies of State records were produced to show that while these two State officials were drawing large amounts from the Anti-Saloon League treasury Superintendent Crabbe was drawing money from the State treasury through the Attorney General's office.

Dr. Schaibly produced records to show that Anti-Saloon League funds were used to pay for campaign cards and campaign circulars for Justice Richard J. Hopkins and to pay for newspaper halftone cuts for Attorney General Griffith.

Dr. Schaibly produced letters, records, and newspaper clippings to show that, in addition to the regular collections made by the Anti-Saloon League through the churches and through pledge-letter campaigns, money was collected in more than thirty-five different communities in the State by Mr. Crabbe which was not handled through the league treasury in the regular way. In many instances this money was collected from persons who sought to finance clean-up campaigns which were never made, and when demands were made that the money be returned this was done through drawing checks on the league's bank account, despite the fact that the original amounts had never been turned over to the league.

As a result of Dr. Schaibly's exposé citizens in various parts of the State who had been "bilked" by the Crabbe-Griffith-Hopkins combination, which operated under the cloak of the law-enforcement organization, made known the details of their sorrowful efforts to succor the cause of law enforcement.

J. E. Brogan, a Coffeyville druggist, produced the most concrete case. Brogan told how Crabbe visited Coffeyville and represented himself as being an assistant attorney general under C. B. Griffith and stated that he would be glad to conduct a clean-up campaign, but that the State was short of funds and that it would take about $600 to gather the required evidence. Brogan and three associates provided the $600. Crabbe pocketed the money and left town. When Brogan complained to the Attorney General, according to his own written statement, the Attorney General denied that Crabbe held a commission as assistant attorney general, but he flatly refused to assist Brogan to get his money back, and the money was never repaid.

In Jefferson County, according to statements by the county commissioners, a little different method was used to get money. Attorney General Griffith called up the Jefferson County officials and advised them that he was getting complaints about law violations and that a clean-up should be made. Then Mr. Crabbe appeared on the scene, and, posing as an assistant attorney general, got the county commissioners to appropriate $600 for a clean-up campaign. A few arrests were made by Crabbe and his men, but the Jefferson County commissioners deny that six hundred dollars' worth of work was done.

These may seem to have been only the acts of individuals for which the Anti-Saloon League could not be held responsible. But in Kansas, as in New York, the Anti-Saloon League as an organization has sought to cover up rather than clean up illegal acts of its agents and has done everything in its power to keep the facts from the public.

After the serious charges were made by Dr. Schaibly, the Kansas headquarters committee refused to open the records to a public inspection, but promised repeatedly that at the annual meeting of the board of trustees the public would be invited to sit in and all facts would be made public.

The annual meeting of the board of trustees was held at Topeka on January 21, with Dr. F. Scott McBride, national superintendent, in attendance. But instead of the public being invited the meeting was made more secret than any that had ever been held. Even the speeches that were then made to the trustees by Attorney General Griffith and Justice Richard J. Hopkins were delivered behind locked doors. And at the close of the meeting, instead of making public all the facts regarding the irregularities charged, the board of trustees, with the approval of the national superintendent, issued a "whitewash" statement, saying:

In the matter of the alleged misuse of league funds we find on detailed examination the league has been charged with no excessive expense accounts in the instance cited nor has there been any expenditure of league funds for salaries in violation of any State statute or sound business practices.

On the day this "whitewash" report was issued Dr. Schaibly made public the fact that in his appearance before the State bar board he had, under oath, related facts, or alleged facts, told to him by Attorney General Griffith relative to the payment of $500 to Griffith from the league treasury for services Griffith rendered in going to Wyoming to represent former Superintendent Crabbe in a case in which a Wyoming ranchman who had given Crabbe $2,000 in payment for contraband liquor, which Crabbe had failed to deliver, was demanding the return of his money.

Under oath Dr. Schaibly told the State bar board that Attorney General Griffith told him this was the service rendered for which the Anti-Saloon League paid the $500. If this is a fact it calls for the explanation of a situation involving the ethics of a State officer drawing a salary from his own State to enforce the law and being paid a fee by the Anti-Saloon League of his State to go to another State to handle the case of an Anti-Saloon League superintendent charged with trafficking in liquor illegally there. The complications are not lessened by the State records, which show that about the same time and while Mr. Griffith was drawing money from the Anti-Saloon League Mr. Crabbe also was drawing money from the State through the Attorney General's department.

Efforts to learn the details of the troubles of Mr. Crabbe in Wyoming have proved futile except for the sworn statement made before the bar board by Dr. Schaibly. Attorney General Griffith has admitted that Mr. Crabbe got into trouble in Wyoming, where he was at the head of the Anti-Saloon League forces before coming to Kansas. Dr. F. Scott McBride, the national superintendent, also admits that Mr. Crabbe got into trouble in Wyoming before coming to Kansas, but the national superintendent has refused to make known the facts. While in Topeka for the "whitewash" investigation of the Kansas league affairs Doctor McBride was asked by the writer for the details of the Crabbe Wyoming troubles. His reply was:

"I do not care to discuss the Wyoming incidents. We have enough here in Kansas to discuss."

And so it would seem they have.

In the Driftway

"TEA tempers the spirits, harmonizes the mind, dispels lassitude, and relieves fatigue; awakens thought and prevents drowsiness, lightens and refreshes the body, and clears the perceptive faculties." These words were written by a Chinese twelve hundred years ago, when tea drinking had already established itself as an ineradicable custom in China. The Drifter is inclined to think they are as true now as they were then; he is not one to champion tea at the expense of coffee, nor does he think it indispensable in all weathers and all climates; but he remembers certain occasions, certain gray, bleak days, certain tramps in the cold wind, at the end of which a number of cups of tea were eminently satisfying. There was one afternoon at Tintagel, for example, that terrifying, grand place on the Cornish coast where the cliffs spread out like the five fingers of a hand and the sea beats mercilessly in between, when he walked about over the slippery rocks for hours, stampeding a hundred thousand gulls that rose in black and white clouds before him, and sat shivering for other hours watching the feathery spray lifting against the red-brown rocks; after these pursuits had been defeated by the fall of night, he came indoors to a snug little sitting room, made himself comfortable before a coal fire, and drank tea until he was ashamed to ask for more hot water, although not until his thirst was completely assuaged.

* * * * *

THESE thoughts on tea are awakened by a booklet, "Tea, An Historical Sketch," written by a member of one of the most famous tea firms in London. It contains, besides conjectures on the origins of tea drinking, the interesting fact that one of the first tea merchants in England was a woman, Maria Tewk, who, in 1725, founded the firm which, under various names, has contained Tukes for seven generations, and who at first was so far from being welcomed into the association of English merchants that she was fined for operating her business without a license—a license denied her for being a woman. In those days the distribution of a commodity was not as simple a matter as it has since become; the tea was brought into the Port of London on valiant merchantmen and loaded on pack-horses to be carried to the northern counties of England. Tea drinking was indulged in only by the rich, and for a hundred years it was frowned upon as the forerunner of prohibitionists, not suitable for anyone else. William Cobbett, in 1822, declared that "the troublesome and pernicious habit of drinking tea" had demoralized England; the agricultural laborer, instead of drinking beer, a nourishing, wholesome beverage, was wasting his energy, money, and time on tea, which had no qualities whatever to recommend it. Cobbett now would be more distressed than ever to learn that the per capita yearly consumption of tea in England is nearly nine pounds, or approximately 1,800 cups. This is almost as bad as Dr. Johnson, who called himself a "hardened and shameless tea drinker whose kettle had hardly time to cool."

* * * * *

THE Drifter himself has marveled at the evidence of the wholesale drinking of tea in London. There the movie palace pales into insignificance alongside the tea palace which rises in ever larger splendor on corner after corner and is filled until well after six o'clock every night by hordes who drink tea and eat cakes. This sort of tea drinking is not to the Drifter's taste at all. He likes his tea in solitude or with the most select of companions. He demands a certain amount of rain and cold weather to whet his appetite. He prefers buttered toast to any amount of tea cakes. And he never, on any occasion, would allow himself to champion that most degenerate aspect of tea drinking, the "afternoon tea," at which dozens of persons crowd into a small room, hang about the tea table, declare their preference for lemon or cream, nibble at macaroons, and profane the air with vapid sounds that are meant for conversation.

Equality Among Women

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Three thousand miles—is it?—is a little far to go for your "Wages for Wives" dinner, but I am interested, in a rather amazed way, in your clearing-of-the-ground articles, or rather in the partial clearing of Mr. Hays's clutter by Miss Stevens. She at least recognizes that a $10,000 income and a retinue of servants is hardly a representative foundation to build an argument on.

And after all—aren't those two debating on the same side in a sense, and wouldn't it have been a little gayer to pit the two of them against an economist? Isn't Miss Stevens's average woman already getting more than her rights compared with the majority woman, and isn't it rather trivial and still more futile to worry about sex inequality when class inequality is the fundamental trouble even there?

I am entirely with Miss Stevens in her contention; of course she should have half, and probably does, as do most wives of just husbands. As a theory, it doesn't seem worth while for intellectuals to debate about it, but as a practice, with so many unjust husbands—and other people—in the world, I seem to see the Social Revolution overtaking such agreements, even as it did in Russia.

In Russia, you know, the economic freedom of the workers brought automatically the equality of women—domestic, economic, and civil. The Russian women never were advanced enough even to know they had any rights and wrongs. Even now, in their psychological inferiority, their rights have to be forced upon them. But it is a joy to see them, little by little—and after all, not so little—getting their heads up into the light and holding them high, and yet not fiercely. Instead of forcing their way into public life they are invited and coaxed and urged, and they are making good most wonderfully. I've just been there watching them do it.

Miss Stevens suggests partnership of "money capital" and "labor capital" in the home, and a sharing of the surplus. Down with the Red! Where, the profiteering husband will ask, in this capitalist world does she find a precedent for such a demand? Justice again—Oh, undoubtedly. And that is just what the awakened working-class woman wants; but there aren't many of her—not only as much as her underpaid husband gets, and frequently doesn't get, but as much as the $10,000 wife gets. And then, what about capital and labor in the $10,000 kitchen? Shall we divide the surplus there?

And in the mill and the mine? Down with all these bolshevistic implications! But that's what lots of us are thinking—the husband of the deficit-sharing wife, and some quite comfortable people. And they'd like to have Doris Stevens come on in, for the water's fine and swimming against the current excellent exercise. If only the feminists would broaden their slogan to "Equality among women"—and men!

ANNA PORTER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Why all this rubbish about Wages for Wives?

I am a wife, representative, I believe, of the average young American woman. My husband is a college graduate (a Yale man, but not a former football star), and he probably earns as much as the average educated male—$3,000 a year. Our home consists of a four-room apartment in a good residential section of Philadelphia. We have been married fifteen months and have a baby boy three months of age. I am, therefore, so to speak, sweetheart, nurse, mistress of the household, seamstress, bookkeeper, shopper, char, and cook. And what is my wage?

Everything that I do for my child is paid in full by one touch of his tiny hands upon my face. Our apartment is such an attractive home that keeping it clean and orderly is a joy rather than a burden. And after spending a couple of hours preparing a meal, who wouldn't thrill to words of praise from a hungry husband?

But you say: "Aren't you a drudge?" No! Keeping busy is the best and cheapest way to happiness. And as I am busy all day, so is my husband busy in his laboratory. I work no harder than he does. We share the same home, same food, and same pleasures. Every two weeks he gives me $50 for household expenses—food, laundry, etc. What I am able to save from this amount I may use as I wish. I do not call this a wage. I do not want to be paid for my services as a wife. I am getting more out of life since married than I ever did before. How many girls who are wage-earners make more than enough for their room and board and a few clothes? Why, then, should they expect so much more after marriage? Supposing my husband paid me $35 a week for my services—the amount I earned as a secretary before I was married. But, also, supposing that I in turn had to pay him for my board and room and clothes. I wonder if I wouldn't be owing him something at the end of the month.

I'll wager that the propagandists in this matter are either old maids or wives who do not do enough work to earn a living wage.

SALLY EDWARDS REINHOLD

Mr. Lamont and Mr. Mussolini

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I, as a matter of record, make two points in reference to your editorial paragraph in The Nation of February 3 on the remarks of Mr. Thomas W. Lamont and Mr. Otto H. Kahn at the Foreign Policy Association luncheon on January 23, on the subject "Fascism: Its International Implications"?

First, you refer to Mr. Lamont's remarks as follows: "He even stated that the people of Italy, terrorized and cowed and deprived of free speech as they are, with their necks under the heel of a dictatorship such as the world has hardly seen since the days of Bomba of Naples, are unanimously behind their government. 'As to the matter of liberalism' said Mr. Lamont, 'the question seems to me to be liberal enough to let Italy have the sort of government she seems to want.'"

A careless reader might get the impression that Mr. Lamont had admitted that the people of Italy are "terrorized and cowed," etc. As a matter of fact, he neither affirmed nor denied these charges. Moreover, your quotation from him is inaccurate. What he said was: "I venture to ask all of us who are manifestly liberal here as to whether we are liberal enough at any event to permit Italy to have the sort of government that she seems to want."

Second, many of your readers might not understand that the anti-Fascist, as well as the pro-Fascist, point of view was put strongly at the luncheon. Professor William Y. Elliott of Harvard, one of the two announced speakers (the other was Count Thaon di Revel, president of the Fascisti League of North America), vigorously attacked the Fascist regime as undemocratic, tyrannical, and unjust.

New York, January 30

Chairman, Foreign Policy Association

Jane Austen's Letters Are Wanted

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You were once so good as to give the very valuable publicity of your columns to an appeal to collectors to send copies of autograph letters of Dr. Johnson for use in a new Oxford edition. May I beg you to do us the same favor with a view to an edition of Jane Austen?

Out of 149 known letters I have seen the originals or reliable copies of 104. Rather less than one-third of the total eludes me; but I am reluctant to proceed with my present resources, and that for two reasons. In the first place, although the errors and omissions of the existing texts are probably not serious, yet an edition cannot be definitive which does not make them good; and the complete or correct text is occasionally a real improvement. In the second place, there is every reason to suppose that the missing letters are not lost but are in the hands of private collectors in this country or (more probably) in America. If so, my experience of collectors assures me that they are only waiting to be asked.

The Automobile Tyranny

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Whether Mr. Bertrand Shadwell hopes for or fears a French revolution here, caused by the speed-murderers, there will be none out this way for the reason that there are not enough persons who walk to make a good wink. The family of my colored washwoman has a car and so have the boy porters of my hotel. So have many of the non-coms and some of the privates at the Presidio. Many high-school boys have their underslung Fords.

This condition has its political bearing. In making arrangements with the local transit bus company for a charter any terms are accepted by the council because the fare-payers are so few and so insignificant economically and socially as virtually not to exist.

The Foreigner

By WITTER BYNNER

Chapala still remembers the foreigner
Who came with a pale red beard and pale blue eyes
And a pale white skin that covered a pale soul;
They remember the midnight when he saw a rough hand
Reach through a broken window and probe for a lock;
They remember a tree on the beach where he used to sit
And ask the burros questions about peace;
They remember him walking, walking away from something.

First Glance

“WHEN, not many days ago, I would refresh my mind after the meanderings of the dialecticians and seek the holy dwellings of the Muses, by chance I laid hand on the ‘Heroides’ of Ovid. Ye Gods, what manifold learning do they display, and how they twinkle with sprightly wit!” So wrote the Renaissance scholar Guido Morillonius in 1516; and it is the distinction of the latest book written in praise of Ovid that this quotation, coming therein toward the close of what has been throughout an enthusiastic discussion, seems no less accurate than ecstatic. The volume on “Ovid and His Influence” which Edward Kennard Rand has contributed to the series called Our Debt to Greece and Rome (Boston: Marshall Jones: $1.50) does perfectly what it is supposed, I take it, to do. In the first place it tells most readably who Ovid was and what kind of poetry he wrote, and, in the second place, it traces the steps of his great influence through European literature down as far as today—ending with a statement of what he might mean to any contemporary so fortunate as to take him up.

Ovid himself is so voluminous, and the things that could be said of him are so numerous, that I marvel at Mr. Rand’s being able to say practically everything of importance in less than two hundred small pages. The reason seems to be that he has gone directly to the central quality of the man and the poet—wit—and never thereafter strayed from that. He had texts ready made for him, of course, in Quintilian’s “Nimium amator ingenii sui” and Ovid’s own “Ingenio perii Naso poeta mei”; but even then he might have wandered, as commentators so frequently do, into detached disquisitions upon the sources of Ovid’s learning, the sincerity of his religion, the causes of his banishment, and the corruptness of his morals. Mr. Rand does discuss all these matters and many more, but it is always in connection with what he compendiously defines as “the poet’s supporting virtue and his embarrassing vice.” That was wit—meaning, it is perhaps unnecessary to say, not only all that is usually meant by the term but more specifically grace and agility of mind, fertility of fancy, and nimbleness of illustration. So completely does Mr. Rand subdue himself to this theme that his synopses of Ovid’s stories tell quite as much about Ovid as they do about the stories, and, incidentally, achieve wit in their own right. So well does he understand his author that he requires but a sentence to resolve the apparent inconsistency between his cynicism and his gullibility: Ovid, he explains, “is at once properly skeptical of poets’ lies and confident of his own power to turn the chaos of brute fact into the cosmos of poetic reality”—hence a work like the “Metamorphoses,” the yarns in which we simultaneously believe and disbelieve. And so intimately do we ourselves begin to know Ovid that the story of his reputation becomes an exciting thing. We smile with Mr. Rand over the hopeless attempt of the Middle Ages to prove that the real reason it liked Ovid was that he was a moralist, a theologian, a physician, a magician, or what not. And we kindle as the roll is called of those later writers who loved Ovid and were somewhat like him—Jean de Meun, Chaucer, Boccaccio, Ariosto, Shakespeare, Prior, and Anatole France.

One who still needed to be convinced that Ovid is perhaps the most engaging of all ancient poets would do well to read F. A. Wright’s “The Mirror of Venus” (Dutton: $3), a recent volume in The Broadway Translations containing English versions of passages from all of Ovid’s books except “The Art of Love”—which, as a good many readers already know to their joy, was done by Mr. Wright for a previous volume. This much of Ovid has never, so far as I know, been rendered more piquantly.

MARK VAN DOREN

A French View of England

Post-War Britain. By André Siegfried. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

THOUGH many books have been written by Englishmen dealing with our new situation, none of them contains within a moderate compass so clear and well-documented an account of the salient features of that situation, with so instructive a commentary, as is contained in this work of this distinguished Frenchman. “Post-War Britain” is an almost perfect example of the French ability to combine scientific method with literary expression. Two-thirds of the volume is occupied with the economic, one-third with the political situation. In each case the selection and orderly statement of the relevant facts are the first consideration. But so skilful is the selection, so vivid the presentation, so incisive and finely rendered the interpretation that the numerous statistics appended to the economic survey acquire almost a literary value from their skill of place and use.

In his presentation of Britain’s economic crisis M. Siegfried shows how our various problems of unemployment, finance, tariffs, wages and production, costs, population, all converge upon the supreme issue, the maintenance and expansion of an export trade large enough to enable us to buy abroad the foods and raw materials needed to support our lives and industries. M. Siegfried analyzes in some detail the constituent markets of our import and export trade, showing the exact percentages of our demands for overseas goods and measuring the reduced sizes of our post-war export trades. The problem, as he clearly indicates, is not produced but only aggravated by the laws. Our supremacy in the output of coal, iron, and steel, the foundations of manufacturing industry, had already been successfully challenged by the United States and Germany before the war, while many other nations formerly dependent for important manufactures upon British products were beginning to establish their economic independence. The poverty of Europe owing to war-ravages and losses, bad finance, tariffs, and political boycotts have kept down the total volume of the post-war foreign trade, and though Britain has held as large a proportion of this trade as before the amount is much diminished.

Free trade, protection, imperial self-sufficiency, emigration of surplus population, revival of British agriculture—all these methods of adjustment to the situation are carefully canvassed by M. Siegfried. He separates the immediate troubles of the reconstruction and the monetary policies from the more permanent demands of our situation. Though neither pronouncing judgment nor indulging in prophecies, he is disposed to think that we cannot keep our growing popularity in a satisfactory way without some radical transformations of our economic policy and institutions. Whether England with her easy-going opportunism can make such profound changes is doubtful. Overpopulation is the economic factor of chief concern:

The great problem is to learn whether the future division of the world's industrial production will be such as to permit, by a paradoxical division of labor, the existence in the United Kingdom of both a colossal manufacturing industry and the world's greatest storehouse of merchandise. If in future years the industrial equipment of Britain, which was created for an unlimited production, can once more begin to export at a profit, then it will be proved that the country is not overpopulated and that the economic crisis is only temporary.

But upon the evidence Britain is dangerously dependent on overseas supplies, nor is it easy to reduce that danger by any policy of exclusive reliance upon imperial trade, for reasons into which the author enters fully.

M. Siegfried's account of the acrobatic performances of Mr. Lloyd George and of the quick changes in our forms of party government shows a remarkable grasp of the most delicate moves in our latest situations. He realizes clearly how ill-adapted our constitution is to a three-party or group system of government, and at the same time how difficult it is for us to incorporate into the old structure "the innovations that the times have rendered necessary." Examining the composition of our political parties he shows how our recent tortuous and inconsistent policies, domestic, financial, and foreign, are explained by the different strains and stresses within a government. His examination of the present condition of the Liberal and Labor parties is exceedingly skilful and objective, for though some features of internal cleavage in both cases are more clearly marked today than in the summer of 1924 (when M. Siegfried completed his study), the main lines of divergence remain as he described them. A final brief chapter, in which the British attitude toward France is submitted to a keen and on the whole a convincing psychological analysis, completes what is a very remarkable study for any foreigner to make of any other people:

The British are usually described as egotistical, but though this is perfectly true, they are honest and unashamed in their egotism. They simply are unable to look at a question from the point of view of anyone else and that is all there is to it. Remind them that you are there, and they will take account of you. Otherwise, you do not exist—for they are really very little concerned over what lies outside their own interests.

There is an unexpected naivete about this. Is it not just what England says of France, or any country of any other country?

A Sentimental Journey

The Diary of a Young Lady of Fashion, in the Year 1764-65.

By Cleone Knox. Edited by her Kinsman Alexander Blacker Kerr. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

THE present volume purports to be the diary of a young Irish coquette whose father conducted her upon a grand tour in an effort to alienate her from the tall dark young man of her affections. It is so obviously a hoax that the publishers can hardly have intended it to be taken seriously, and they must have been considerably surprised to find its genuineness unquestioned in certain reviews published in solemn literary journals. But though as obviously modern as "Serena Blandish," it is a gay little pastiche composed by someone whose flair for the piquancies of a vanished society is so acute as to constitute, in itself, sufficient proof that he was not himself a member of that society. Neither its wit nor its irony is as complicated or incisive as that exhibited in "Serena," but it has a certain bubbling gaiety of its own and it will serve admirably to pass an amusing hour.

Cleone had the good fortune—for one of her temperament—to be born in the golden age of gallantry. It was a time when Decorum, though much written about with capital letters, was even less practiced than it is today, and a time when young ladies, though often affected with Vapors and expected to believe that a marriage based upon Mutual Esteem was more likely to be happy than one inspired by Passion, were nevertheless strongly inclined to romance. Since statistically minded doctors had not thrown doubts upon the wild-oats theory, Beauty looked with tolerant sympathy upon the rake and every young lady of spirit was glad to have at least the opportunity of refusing entrance to a gallant who had climbed the ivy to her window. Nor was Cleone any exception to the general rule. A gentlewoman and a belle, her mind had little time to occupy itself with any affairs other than those coordinately important ones of the heart and the wardrobe; but she found these sufficient. She recorded with excitement those various occasions when she came near to staining her honor or her new brocade, and though, so the editor informs us, she finally had the good fortune to reach the safe harbor of marriage with her gallant there was one occasion when, pressed for a rendezvous, she had the candor to write: "My inclination is to go—my prudence bids me stay, but Lud! if one listen to prudence one might die a Spinster!" Cleone was, in short, a second Belinda, of whom, as of the first, one might truthfully say:

If to her share some female errors fall
Look at her face and you'll forget 'em all.

Her tour included not only England and France but Switzerland and Italy too, and her observations of men and manners were influenced by the provincial's preference for home ways as well as his readiness to marvel. Thus she found a certain insipidity in the English scene and she thought the inhabitants contributed to this effect; "for they have a clean busy air about them, as if they loved work and were anxious to do their duty." "Geneva," too, was only "a large, Melancholy town, full of Pastors and excessively cold"; but the warmth of the Latin temperament produced effects more to her liking in spite of the fact that she thought St. Mark's in Venice in no way comparable to Westminster Abbey chiefly because it was small and dark with "an exotic Papist air about it which does not please me." At Ferney her brother had the temerity to dispute with Voltaire upon "the Influence of Religion on the Female Mind." She, however, listened in silence "with that Respect which is due to Genius, however Wearisome it may be."

Though the political philosopher will not find much to interest him in most of Cleone's observations, the contrast which she notes between the social license of France, where political heresy is so quickly punished, and the moral austerity of free Switzerland does suggest a thought which may be recommended to the members of the Ku Klux and all those whose concern for purity is equaled only by their insistence upon the danger of false political doctrine. Liberty is generally granted to a people in one department and in one only. There are countries where you may behave as scandalously as you like, but must speak with respect of the king, and there are countries where it is nobody's business what your political opinions are, but everybody's business whether you keep a mistress or not. There have not, however, been many times or places where both privileges were either granted or denied; history has shown that Cleone's observation of a particular case has a general applicability. For reasons upon which the philosopher may be given opportunity to speculate, the censor of opinions generally loses interest in manners and vice versa.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

George Washington Himself

The Diaries of George Washington: 1748-1799. Edited by John C. Fitzpatrick. Houghton Mifflin Company. Four volumes. $25.

George Washington in Love and Otherwise. By Eugene E. Prussing. Chicago: Pascal Covici. $5.

FROM some points of view it would be difficult to place too high an estimate on these "Diaries." Not even the letters give so intimate approach to Washington in his daily occupations, and the letters require this supplementary record of his relations to others, his interests in his plantation, and his vision of what the future might bring to Virginia and the Western Country, then bounded by the Mississippi. The quality of the record is in no way distinguished. The entries, expressed in the baldest form, convey no impression of literary finish, of careful thought, of personality. By an unknown writer they would be almost negligible; known to be Washington's, and studied in the light of that knowledge, they become valuable not for the historical content but for their reflection of a mind at once commonplace and unerring in judgment. Few of his contemporaries could approach him in ability to grasp the essentials of a complicated problem, economic or political, or equal him in expressing tersely his conclusions, or match his poverty or simplicity of language.

Here are four stately volumes admirably compiled and edited by the person best equipped for the task. They contain diaries recording journeys to the Western region for public and private objects, years of occupation in the maintenance of a Virginia plantation with slave labor, years of war, of a return to Mount Vernon to face new and more difficult problems of land management, of the first Presidency of the new republic, and again of a changed Virginian home. Each day the weather was noted, and then followed a single line or two of colorless entry. The few occasions on which the writer does permit himself to go outside of fact are precious reflections of character from which a man great even in his littlenesses can be pictured. No quotations can begin to give a true idea of what these diaries will mean to the student of Washington. The notes of the editor are excellent, being drawn from many sources and furnishing necessary explanations of the text. The great difficulties of proper identification of names have been met judiciously, and the absence of assertion where doubt could exist gives confidence in the knowledge and discretion of Mr. Fitzpatrick.

It is as a planter that Washington becomes most interesting. He shows himself a careful manager, much interested in new methods and implements, and well in advance of his day in experimenting for himself or in obtaining suggestions from others. The days of plowing and planting, of the first appearance of crops above ground; the trials of new seeds, plants, and trees in different soils (that of Mount Vernon not being of the richest); the tests and records of his overseers and slaves—the account of all this makes a valuable contribution to the understanding of economic Virginia in the eighteenth century. Tobacco as the leading crop ceased to be profitable, and a rotation of crops—requiring years to be reduced to a system—promised better results from the land as well as a better condition for the greatly exhausted fields. Slave labor prevented the realization of these benefits. Washington measures the waste of that labor, he seeks to train it, and finally, with a sense of failure, he looks for tenants as a substitute. On the management of the plantation he gives enough detail to allow a careful study to be made of this period of transition, though his absences in the army and the Presidency break the continuity. Little wonder that he looked with longing eyes on the rich lands of the Ohio and felt their importance for the future of the country under free labor.

It would be easy to point out many subjects on which the diaries are regrettably meager—subjects like the land companies, Potomac improvement, and ventures in locating soldiers' lands, the rights to which Washington bought largely. The loss or omission of records for the years of war and Presidency does not seem so vital, for Washington showed little wish or ability to treat of public affairs in this kind of document. The glimpses of family relations are welcome, but the social entries hardly rise above lists of guests, with hardly a hint to explain their object in coming or the impression produced. Yet Mount Vernon he described as a well-frequented tavern, open to the curious stranger and quite on the road of Southern travel. The skill to draw a character was not wanting—the searching notes on the generals of the revolution prove that; but the power is rarely exercised, unless Washington has been "done" in a land purchase or a contract for building. The explosive frankness of John Adams and the calmer, yet still vital, comments of his son in their diaries are far more illuminating than the complete absence of feeling shown by Washington. Yet any other kind of diary would not have been Washington. Its flatness is the highest proof of its being his, and the reader must be content with the few flashes of feeling, restrained as they are, when he views the Ohio or plans the Yorktown siege. As history these volumes will be source material; to the student of character they will be invaluable. The Lady Regents of Mount Vernon, for whom they were published, have performed a service as well as a duty and their manner of procedure calls for the highest praise.

Mr. Prussing's volume is of varying quality. He revamps the old story of Washington's love for Mrs. Fairfax, a story of little or no foundation; he sketches Washington as an engineer—a somewhat misleading title, for Washington hardly was more than a surveyor—and as a captain of industry, which no slaveholder could be. A real contribution lies in the history of the Bank of England stock which came to Mrs. Custis and through her in part to Washington. It was not confiscated because of Washington's leadership in the American "rebellion," and he enjoyed the full privileges accorded during that period to English stockholders.

WORTHINGTON C. FORD

What Price Laissez-Faire?

The Case of Bituminous Coal. By Walton H. Hamilton and Helen R. Wright. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

What the Coal Commission Found. By Edward Eyre Hunt, F. G. Tryon, and Joseph H. Willits. Baltimore: Williams and Wilkins Company.

THESE are probably the two best books on coal ever written—with the possible exception of Jevons's classic document. Certainly they are the best dealing with the American scene. Messrs. Hunt, Tryon, and Willits have summarized and made intelligible and interesting the great mass of data collected by the federal Coal Commission of 1922—the most exhaustive investigation attempted to date, and covering both anthracite and bituminous. With rare judgment they have picked the essential from the ruck in costs, royalties, prices, profits, extent of monopoly, wholesaler's and retailer's margins, wages, hours, accidents, working conditions, union rules, living conditions of the miners, and the outstanding channels of waste. They have provided an invaluable handbook of the industry.

Mr. Hamilton and Miss Wright have gone a step farther. Basing their thesis in part upon the data of the Coal Commission and in part upon an analysis of the literature which the industry itself puts forth, they have brought all the loose threads together and told a story of a competitive industry which for realism, logic of development, and brilliance of style will not soon be surpassed in economic chronicles. With this volume the "new economics" comes into its own. The questioning, doubting, quantitative school—suspicious of immutable laws and determined to look facts in the face wherever they may lead—has produced an authentic masterpiece. A complex situation is not violated by simplification—it is met squarely, every tangled corner of it. There is no attempt to prove anything; no nonsense about those pious hopes which are so wont to travel under the head of "constructive suggestions." The good Rotarian with his precious litany of free competition reduced to gibberish can take comfort in the equal destruction of all the plans of nationalization, industrial democracy, scientific management, cooperation, and what-not evolved by all the forward lookers to date. There isn't a ray of hope in all the 300 pages, and yet the book remains the most stimulating and the most hopeful thing ever written about coal—if not about the whole going structure of industry. It has junked all the dogmas, the preconceptions, the sentimentalities, the illusions, and the bright ideas which pass for thought—and shown us with the terrible starkness of a cold green dawn the coal industry for what it is—Exhibit A of the policy of muddling through.

And the three authors find not the slightest evidence to support any change of policy in the calculable future. They picture with admirable vividness and admirable documentation the "coal cycles" which are before us. Cycles which promise gluts, famines, price somersaults, unemployment, the shattering of labor standards and probably the organization of the United Mine Workers, bankruptcies, shut-downs, reorganizations, new technical methods capsize by trying to meet interest on investment. While such a prophecy may startle when it is loosed suddenly, no reader who has followed the analysis of the industry thus far, plus the brilliant account of the new technique of machine mining, can fail to see that the "cycle" fits the facts as a garter fits the leg. The operator sits at his desk, his head sunk in his hands. To modernize or not to modernize, that is the question. He will be damned if he does, and damned if he doesn't. And even more tragic is the future for the miner. But God, having destroyed carboniferous forests with unheard-of prodigality in these States, will probably keep the consumer supplied at a price and with a quality that is no more uncertain than it has been in the immediate past.

The book is too well knit, too relentless in its development to attempt a summary. Impressions are the most that the reviewer can give—a particularly poignant one coming from the extraordinary aptness of the quotations from Gilbert and Sullivan at the head of each chapter. Perhaps the outstanding impression is that nobody should be allowed to mention soft coal in public until he reads the book. Oh, yes. . . . The hopeful thing is that if much more of such destructive analysis of the going economic structure leaks out, men may come out of their cloudlands of laissez-faire and begin consciously to plan for their economic subsistence. But such a consummation, I am willing to admit, is only a pious hope.

STUART CHASE

A Cocksure Criminologist

Battling the Criminal. By Richard Washburn Child. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.50.

THIS is a flashy and inaccurate book. Mr. Child began his nation-wide study of crime as an ex-United States ambassador to Italy, and he finished it in the state of mind of a chief of police. Not that there is not plenty of crime in the United States or that many criminals are not young. Mr. Child is quite right; both of these things are true. But Mr. Child is no nearer to being able to explain these facts than anybody else. He talks freely about an "era of unrestrained youth" and pushes out on to the sidewalk all scientists, psychologists, and criminologists, insisting that they do no good and seldom know what they are talking about. It has not occurred to Mr. Child, apparently, that the methods of dealing with criminals in this country have never for a single day been in the hands of psychologists and criminologists. When these gentlemen are given a chance to show what they can do it will then be time for Mr. Child and those who believe in hamstringing as a moral influence to say what they think of them. The present crime situation in the United States follows directly upon decades, generations even, of repressive prison methods if our chosen way of treating the offender is so excellent, why has it not assisted in the reduction of crime?

Yet Mr. Child would go on, adding punishment to punishment. "Hard and long prison sentences having failed," he would say, "let us make them harder and longer." The trouble is that typical prison treatment in America, while it may satisfy the desire for vengeance of many of those who remain outside, does nothing to reform those on the inside. Mr. Child confuses the desire of the criminologist to learn why men commit crime with the intention of someone else to "coddle" criminals, and so of course he says ridiculous things. But there is no justification for such confusion.

Mr. Child makes some good points in regard to the extraordinary defects of our criminal law and our methods of trial. We are altogether too slow about putting cases through our courts, and we leave too many loopholes through which the guilty may evade conviction. But the spirit of the whole book is cocksure and misleading.

WINTHROP D. LANE

Hit-or-Miss Biography

Uncommon Americans. By Don C. Seitz. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

THE open season for game in biographical preserves still continues, and the publishers vie with one another in their eagerness to supply hunting licenses to prospective sharpshooters. Since the elephants and tigers have been pretty thoroughly wiped out, the marksmen are more and more compelled to level their muzzle-loaders, smooth-bores, or express rifles at the smaller fry. Once in a while, to be sure, they chance upon a mastodon that has merely been scratched or partially crippled by some preceding hunter, and—crack! Score another hit—or miss.

Mr. Seitz has manfully attempted to bring permanently to earth a veritable menagerie of uncouth specimens, yet most of them have managed to escape with only a scar or two. Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, Susan B. Anthony, Whistler, Mary Baker Eddy—these are the most familiar of his twenty-two victims; but one finishes his jaded journalese feeling that he has barely barked their shins. He writes better, perhaps, about lesser known yet not wholly uncharted ragamuffins such as Ethan Allen, Peter Cartwright, Tecumseh, Israel Putnam, and so on, and still one has the uncomfortable feeling that these are treated better only because they have been less mauled about by other writers, or because they are intrinsically more interesting.

It is a little hard to see why the biographer of Artemus Ward and Joseph Pulitzer—both of whom he handled at least adequately—should be satisfied with such sophomoric stuff as packs this book. Great writers, or even tolerably good writers, are not in the habit of emphasizing their ideas with a wilderness of exclamation points; nor do they allow themselves to clutter their manuscripts with awkwardly turned phrases and slipshod sentences. Again, Mr. Seitz rarely varies his method: he is usually content to tell a collection of good stories about each of his pets and let it go at that. Yet, despite these defects, it is a pleasure to record that he is always fair-minded and suave; he points few morals and seldom tries to edify his reader; he is equally sympathetic toward the poor wretches scalped in turn by Tecumseh and Mrs. Eddy. But he ought to turn to a book, published last year, that deserved immeasurably more attention and sales than it had—the "Imaginary Lives" of Marcel Schwob; for in it he might observe the distinction between superbly artistic, as opposed to journalistic, biography.

Books in Brief

The Problem of Immortality. By R. A. Tsanoff. The Macmillan Company. $3.

With incredible patience Dr. Tsanoff traces all the preconceptions of purgatory and heaven and all the schools of immortality and destiny which have harassed mankind. To the student of magic, myth, metaphysics, and theology in their long persecution of reason this book is an invaluable guide. But unfortunately the author's thesis does not follow from his research. His research shows that all these eschatological concepts have not grown even in mere sophistication from the earliest folk-lore to the current platitude that we are immortalized to the extent of the "service" we render, a platitude which only adds moral confusion to our spiritual politics; while his thesis is that the very immemorialness of this "hunger" for immortality, which throughout he defines allegorically, points to a hereafter, model 1924. It is the old Kantian apology: rationally it makes no sense, but it is safer to believe it! Kant wrote thus at the direct behest of the Prussian state; the neo-Kantian Dr. Tsanoff teaches philosophy in the State of Texas.

Fundamental Ends of Life. By Rufus M. Jones. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

An inquiry into the history of philosophy to prove that "men want" mystical "life-values." In the chapter on The Idea of the Good in Plato Dr. Jones, with the cautious qualifications of sophisticated learning, attributes a spiritual inwardness to Platonic idealism which is peculiarly alien to the ineffable civism of the "Republic." The gospels he treats with the reverence which reduces exegesis to piety. He endows Kant's moral imperative with spiritual implications, to whose destruction Kant devoted half a century of explicit agnosticism. The British empiricists, the Continental rationalists, the temper of modern philosophy he ignores. In short, he reinterprets the most controversial metaphysical portions in the history of thought to prove that the "fundamental ends of life" are introversive. For such proofs the dogmatics of orthodoxy are more relevant premises.

The Quebec Act: A Study in Statesmanship. By R. Coupland. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

The scope of this book, the work of the Beit Professor of Colonial History at Oxford, is wider than the title indicates. Of the four chapters, only one relates directly to the Quebec Act, the first two chapters being devoted to a summary discussion of the history of Canada from 1763, when the region was acquired by Great Britain, and the administrative work of Murray and Carleton, while the last sketches the testing of the new policy in the outbreak of the American Revolution and the fatuous attempt of the Americans to conquer Canada. The work is a scholarly production, however, well documented and well written. Professor Coupland does merited justice to Carleton, whose ideas the Quebec Act embodied, and criticizes frankly, but without prejudice, the difficulties which arose, largely because of the British attitude toward the French, as the provisions of the act came to be applied. Appendices give the texts of the Quebec Capitulation of 1759, with the French requests and the British replies, and of the Quebec bill with the Commons' amendments.

Vie de Jaurès. By Paul Desanges et Luc Mériça. Paris: G. Crès.

The detailed and definitive Life of Jean Jaurès has yet to be written. The generous internationalist Romain Rolland composed an eloquent small volume of tribute to him, as he has since compiled a Life of that other dauntless pacifist, Mahatma Gandhi. Maurras misrepresented and abused him, Adolphe Brisson marveled at his gift of prophecy, Anatole France and Trotsky extolled him, and his fellow-socialist Charles Rappoport wrote a well-documented volume which is thus far our most important single study of him. But Rappoport wrote in 1915, and we know a number of things about the European situation on the eve of the war which Rappoport did not know in 1915. Very little of what we have learned since reflects much credit on either nations or individuals, but much of it emphasizes the clairvoyance of this party leader who was at the same time a great thinker, a fruitful student of history, and, most remarkable of all perhaps for a party leader, a great lover of mankind. It is unfortunate that Desanges and Mériça have not caught the optimism of their great leader. The book is soberly done, with no anecdotal relief, and devotes more attention to doctrines than to the exterior circumstances of Jaurès's life. It has a masterly incidental survey of European affairs during the decade just before the war, and notably of the fortunes of socialism in France and Germany during that period, making it all in all a decidedly useful little volume.

The Cell in Development and Heredity. By E. B. Wilson. Third edition. The Macmillan Company. $9.

In spite of its being called a third edition, this is really a new book and one of the most notable contributions to the biological literature of the times. The second edition appeared in 1900, the year Mendel's work was rediscovered, the beginning of the modern period of work in heredity. This book, by the dean of American zoologists, represents a life work; grown to monumental size, it is written throughout from the standpoint of the last twenty-four years—which have made the study of the cell, heredity, evolution, and development a single subject. Being a great teacher, the author writes with clearness; being a great scientist, he does not indulge in questionable human applications.

Drama

Long Island Sentiment

F. SCOTT FITZGERALD was born into the flapper age with exactly the qualities and the defects which would enable him to become its accredited historian. Though granted just enough detachment to make him undertake the task of describing, he is by temperament too much a part of the things described to view them with any very penetratingly critical eye and he sees flappers, male and female, much as they see themselves. Sharing to a very considerable extent in their psychological processes, he romanticizes their puerilities in much the same fashion as they do; and when he pictures the manners of the fraternity house or the Long Island villa he pictures them less as they are than as their practitioners like to imagine them. He makes cocktails and kisses seem thrillingly wicked; he flatters the younger generation with the solemn warning that it is leading the world straight to the devil; and as a result he writes The Flapper's Own History of Flapperism. Thus he becomes less the genuine historian of a phase of social development than one of the characteristic phenomena of that development itself, and his books are seen to be little more than documents for the study of the thing which they purport to treat.

His works, like the works of Michael Arlen, illustrate the Nemesis of sophistication, which in their case turns out to be an abysmal if disguised sentimentality. Cynicism and disillusion are qualities which require ripening to develop and fortitude to bear if they are to constitute more than a pose. The youth who leaps gaily after them cannot live comfortably in the harsh world which they create, so that sentimentality, disguised or perverted, almost inevitably reenters by way of offering a compensation. All the old falsities reappear and constitute the chief charm of the writer for that portion of his audience which finds itself the victim of the same conflict between intellectual pose and emotional need which generates his work. Cynicism is modish, but sentimentality is comfortable.

"The Great Gatsby" (Ambassador Theater) has been fashioned by Owen Davis from Mr. Fitzgerald's novel of the same name, and the play has the same elements of popularity as the book. Here is that ever-intriguing figure the romantic criminal brought absolutely up to date; here, that is to say, is Robin Hood reincarnated as a bootlegger, and here too is the sauce of contemporary smartness supplying in liberal measure an additional piquancy to the dish. Thanks to the talent which has for evoking the general atmosphere which is supposed to invest the smart set Mr. Fitzgerald can give to this naive and sentimental story an air of sophistication, and in that fact lies the secret of his popularity. In its essence "The Great Gatsby" is a preposterously maudlin tale of the efforts of a poor boy to become rich enough to "make himself worthy" of a girl with whom he had had a war-time flirtation; in its accidents it purports to be a sophisticated picture of flapper morality; and as a result of these two elements it presents an excellent opportunity for that large portion of the population—which loves sentimentality, but is ashamed to indulge its taste—to enjoy itself thoroughly.

In the beginning the play promises something a little better than it eventually gives. The smart dialogue is brightly written and the characters, excellently interpreted by a uniformly capable cast which includes Florence Eldridge and James Rennie, are at least clear cut and recognizable types. Even the conception of Gatsby himself includes its strokes of truth and of pathos, for there is material for a real study in the story of this man who aspires wistfully toward a world into which he has not been born. But as the piece develops it grows steadily more meretricious. It takes its colors less and less from reality and more and more from a sort of servant-girl's dream world until it ends in sheer and tawdry melodrama. "The Great Gatsby" has the humor which "The Green Hat" in its dramatic form so completely lacks, but it belongs to a related genre.

I hazard the guess that the New York theatergoer has never before had the opportunity granted him at the present moment of choosing between four Ibsen plays. In addition to "The Master Builder," which has been running for some time, "Hedda Gabler" (Comedy Theater), "John Gabriel Borkman" (Booth Theater), and "Little Eyolf" (Guild Theater) have just been produced, the two last for special matinees only. Of the three the first is both the finest play and the finest performance. In "Hedda" Ibsen made a searching analysis of a character who was less local and less peculiarly the product of a particular set of circumstances than either Borkman or the parents of Little Eyolf, and his play has lost little or nothing in either power or pertinence, whereas the other two, and particularly the last, are beginning to seem a little remote in spite of their dramatic power. Egdon Brecher, Eva Le Gallienne, and Marian Warring-Manly give excellent performances in "John Gabriel Borkman" and Emily Stevens makes an effective if somewhat vulgar Hedda; but the outstanding performance is the Tesman of Dudley Digges. He succeeds perfectly in realizing the absurdity of the character without making it wholly ridiculous, and his achievement is thrown into higher relief by the comparison afforded by the Alfred Allmers of Reginald Owen in "Little Eyolf." Mr. Owen makes Allmers seem only a pompous fool and that was not by any means, I think, Ibsen's intention.

At the Plymouth Theater is being revived that most excellent and thrilling of modern melodramas, "The Jest," with Basil Sydney and Violet Heming giving good performances and Alphonz Ethier overtopping everyone in the role which Lionel Barrymore made famous. "The Beaten Track" (Frolic Theater) is a serious play of Welsh life not without a certain sincerity, but spoiled by stilted over-literary dialogue and very leisurely action.

Shall Austria's Culture Survive?

THE report printed below on the deplorable conditions in Austrian universities was written by Professor Richard Wettstein of Vienna, president of the Notgemeinschaft Oesterreichischer Wissenschaft.

Science and learning in Austria have suffered severely in consequence of the World War and the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. The general knowledge of this deplorable fact has found its expression in the readiness to render assistance which has been manifested especially on the part of the United States and the northern states of Europe (above all, Sweden and Holland). The gratitude which this help deserves cannot be adequately expressed in words.

During the past few years the opinion has been gaining ground that a recovery has taken place. This opinion is based on the results attained by the League of Nations, which claimed the stabilization of the Austrian currency and the balancing of the Austrian budget as achievements of great value. Unfortunately the benefits accruing to cultural interests from this rehabilitation have not been very great. This is mainly due to the fact that the normal budget, as determined by the League of Nations, is undoubtedly too limited, and that the stabilization of the currency was effected at a time when the Austrian crown was at so low a rate of exchange that all existing capital and income, as measured in crowns, was completely depreciated. The normal budget is so limited that it is insufficient to satisfy the manifold needs of a recovering commonwealth. In consequence any expenditure deemed indispensable for general economic and political needs—with emphasis on the latter—will be incurred to the prejudice of other needs, and cultural interests are the first to suffer in this way. That the normal budget, as determined by the League of Nations, is too limited may be gathered with sufficient clearness from the one fact that, in consequence of the rising exchange of the English pound in 1925, the debt service of the loan authorized by the League alone necessitated an additional expenditure of several billions of Austrian crowns, which had to be found by curtailing other items of the budget.

By the stabilization of the currency, together with the establishment of the schilling as monetary unit, one schilling being approximately equal to 10,000 Austrian crowns, all existing fortunes, as measured in crowns, have been practically wiped out, and all existing incomes which could not be valorized to their full amount represent a very serious impoverishment, as compared with pre-war earnings. In other words, the rehabilitation of Austria, while making it possible to hope for gradual recovery in the future, carried with it complete renunciation of all fortunes acquired in the past except where they consisted of possessions of intrinsic value.

Inasmuch as the scientific institutes and the members of the learned professions in general have either not been able to valorize their property and their income at all, or only a small part of it, the distress in these circles is great and it is further aggravated by the fact that prices have risen to a considerable degree during the past few years.

In order to repair the damages caused by the war—gaps in the libraries, deterioration of instruments, and institutions in general—in order to resume the former activities to their full extent and to reap the advantages of the progress made during the past decade by purchasing new periodicals, new books, new instruments, the receipts would have to be considerably larger than in 1914, instead of which they are very much smaller. This is, in brief, the main cause of the distress in scientific circles—not to speak of the mental anguish that must be added to it.

This is evidenced by a number of facts:

In 1925 the philosophical faculty of the University of Vienna received only about 36 per cent of the pre-war grants. Quite recently, it is true, these amounts have been supplemented by allotments from the lecture fees contributed by the students. But these receipts, which are subject to wide fluctuations, do not by any means make up for the decrease in the annual grants, and they are very far from bringing the total up to a figure that could even approximately satisfy the most urgent needs.

Furthermore, the prices of scientific instruments (apparatus, reagents, etc.) have risen greatly since 1914. A great variety of objects have been enumerated, and the prices quoted are based on careful inquiries. The increase in the prices of optical apparatus amounts to about 40 per cent, of glassware 60 per cent, of chemical apparatus 100 per cent, and of chemicals 80 per cent.

The subscription rates of scientific periodicals have increased on the average by 60 per cent. As a matter of fact, the increase in the prices of books is considerably higher than for periodicals, since, naturally enough, the publishers of periodicals hesitate to raise the subscription rates too much, for fear of losing a great number of subscribers.

It is evident from these facts that science and learning have suffered in Austria chiefly because of the great falling-off in the receipts of scientific institutes, etc., together with greatly advanced prices. But there are other factors which have to be added to this. In the first place the greatly reduced financial circumstances of the individual members of the learned professions: all fortunes acquired in pre-war times have either disappeared altogether or shrunk to very small dimensions, while the incomes—whether salaries or the returns of literary work—are very much lower. In former times the private resources of a scholar frequently enabled him to procure what the institutes were unable to provide; he also could afford to travel and thus establish personal connections from which the institutes benefited. This is no longer possible. A few examples may serve to show what this means in individual cases. The following statements are based on inquiries regarding certain professors at the University of Vienna. Before the war their annual purchases for their private libraries averaged 50, 30, and 25 books, respectively. The corresponding figures for 1924 were 8, 5, and 3! Is it not obvious that such a decrease in the individual purchasing power must have far-reaching effects not only on the scientific and literary work of the professors themselves as well as their assistants but on literary production in general?

Before the war one scientific periodical had 17 subscribers in Vienna; today, it has only five. The decrease in the purchasing power affects all classes of the population alike, and this again has its effects on science and learning. It was formerly a matter of course for students to buy at least the more important handbooks; today it happens only in rare cases that a student is able to purchase a book for himself. Naturally the same is true of scientific instruments and other accessories. This is bound to exercise, in its turn, an adverse influence on the efficiency of publishers, manufacturers of instruments, and so on. This impoverishment has affected not only the individual scholars but the various corporate bodies which used to be so active and successful in furthering science and learning, and, likewise, those classes of the population which used to regard the promotion of cultural progress as an obligation imposed by the possession of wealth. To mention only one example, the Vienna Academy of Sciences was able, in former years, to publish in its Proceedings and Memoirs a very considerable part of the literary output of Austrian scholars, including many learned treatises for which a publisher could not be found on account of the very limited circle of readers to which they appealed. In addition the Vienna Academy used to be able every year to appropriate considerable amounts for subventions, for expeditions, excavations, etc. Today, it is enabled only by the patronage of some well-wishers to print its Proceedings and Memoirs in a greatly reduced form, while only minimal amounts are at its disposal for purposes of subvention; above all, it is no longer in its power to take the initiative in any movement for the advancement of learning.

Another factor of far-reaching importance is the disintegration of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy with its approximately 50,000,000 inhabitants into separate states, each aiming at cultural independence for itself. In former years Austrian booksellers and manufacturers of scientific instruments were in a position to make their arrangements for supplying a large country, containing numerous institutes; today they find their market restricted to a small and impoverished country with only 6,000,000 inhabitants. Tariff acts and movements for independence have rendered commercial competition more acute than ever and have resulted in greatly diminished sales of cultural products.

These difficulties are further aggravated by two circumstances: the effects of recent events on the state of mind of the scholars and the impossibility of participating in the scientific progress made in other and happier countries. The mental effects of recent events include not only the lowering of intellectual efficiency in consequence of worries and privations, the increased competition with baneful consequences, the loss of promising young scholars who enter other professions or go to other countries, but also the deeply depressing effects of the whole situation, the exhaustive efforts necessary for the acquisition of the most indispensable scientific equipment, and, above all, the limits imposed upon the scholars in having to restrict their scientific work to what can be accomplished with the small means at their disposal.

Famine in Lower Silesia

THE following article by Leo Lania appeared in the Welt-Bühne a few months ago. Conditions in the district, however, are reported to be unchanged:

I had thought that the misery in the northern part of Berlin, the famine in the industrial villages of Saxony, the daily terrible fight for a piece of bread, for a pound of potatoes, which we all had to witness during the long months of the "inflation period," had hardened me. But it was with horror that I saw the terrible distress in the mining district of Lower Silesia. Even the most eloquent descriptions fail utterly to convey the awful reality of these scenes.

Waldenburg, a town of some 45,000 inhabitants, is the capital of the Silesian district of the same name. The population of the entire district is 180,000 people. Eighty per cent of all the wage-earning inhabitants of the district are industrial workmen, the large majority of whom are employed in the great coal mines, the remainder in a big porcelain factory and some small textile factories. The men you see walking along the main street seem to be doomed to death. Thirty thousand miners. Famine kills them—men, women, and children.

The mining district of Lower Silesia has always had to face great economic difficulties, because for various technical reasons the production of coal is handicapped, especially as compared with the nearby famous Upper Silesia district. . . .

During the war Austria and Czecho-Slovakia were the biggest consumers of coal from this district. In the years after the war, when the fuel shortage was acute, these countries found other sources for their supply. In Germany peat suddenly began to be used instead of coal. Other districts could produce fuel cheaper. The high costs of production had, therefore, to be reduced. The consequence was that wages were reduced.

These were the results: The earnings of a miner for a nine-hour day are 3.80 gold marks—90 cents. The State Department of Mines has sanctioned the nine-hour day for "reasons of production." A protest of the miners' union has has come to us from the women and children in the soft coal fields of West Virginia and Central Pennsylvania.

Thousands of families, driven from their company-owned homes, are living in tents and flimsy shacks, enduring bitter cold and untold hardships. For months and months the miners have been carrying on their struggle to maintain the union wage scale, and each day of struggle means an added day of suffering for the women and children.

The United Mine Workers of America are supplying relief, but it is barely enough to support life. They have turned to their friends outside for help.

MONEY and CLOTHING are needed IMMEDIATELY

Checks should be drawn to the order of Evelyn Preston, Treasurer, and sent to the office of the Emergency Committee for Miners' Relief, Room 635, 799 Broadway, New York. This committee has been formed by the League for Industrial Democracy and the American Civil Liberties Union. Its expenses are already guaranteed, and every cent contributed will go direct to the miners.

If you live in or near New York City, warm, substantial clothing for men, women and children can be sent to this same address, Room 635, 799 Broadway, and it will be reshipped to those in need.

If you live outside of New York, send your checks to the office of the committee and your clothing direct to

THE difficult financial conditions of Germany and Austria are endangering the schools and universities of these countries. The isolation of teachers in smaller towns deprives them of intercourse with the outer world: scientists are unable to keep up with the progress of work in other countries. The efficiency of the scientists and of the schools is seriously menaced, unless a remedy for this situation can be found.

Through generous contributions of members and friends, the Emergency Society for German and Austrian Science and Art has been enabled to do something to relieve these difficulties.

Careful investigation of present conditions shows that for the current year a considerable amount of help is still required. In many towns and cities of Germany, associations of friends of the schools and universities have been formed which give assistance out of their private funds, and the attention of the trustees and patrons of the schools and universities is directed, everywhere, to an amelioration of the situation. Conditions, however, are such that for the current year and the next help from the outside is still imperatively needed.

You are earnestly requested to respond to this humanitarian appeal and to send your check drawn to the order of James Speyer, Treas., to the Corresponding Secretary, Prof. F. W. J. Heuser, Columbia University, New York City.

anyone else, and that is the Prussian State Labor Department's estimate. Germany's labor laws are legally the maximum wage law. After deducting the compulsory charges for unemployment and health insurance from 11 to 16 per cent of the wage, the employer has at best only about 10 marks a week left. From this he has to pay at once 10 to 15 marks for rent and when the rent rises he is supposed to support his wife and children. Everybody knows that the masses in the Ruhr district are not well paid, but their official wages are 100 marks per day, while that of their comrades in Saxony is 10 marks.

How do these masses in Saxony live? They starve. The only thing they eat upon a potatoes day after day. Sundays they have meat. The Sunday "family" dinner can cost no more than 50 pfennigs (10 cents), the wife of a miner told me. She has a boy after her first children. But the most shocking thing is that bread is an absolute luxury.

Enter the mother into the mine and the children take a good deal of it, it is not sufficient for all. That is what I heard everywhere and that is the absolute truth. Naturally most of the mothers give it to their children. When I walked with the secretary of the union through the mines the first question of the men after their "Good morning" was "Didn't you bring me a piece of bread?"

Before me lie the statistics of the health situation in the Walleburg elementary schools. Of 5,296 children 1,622, or 30.6 per cent, are woefully ill. 293 are in the last stages of tuberculosis; 82 per cent never have a warm meal during the week; 214 per cent have no overcoats; 242 per cent have only one pair of stockings; 211 per cent are undernourished, although not diseased.

Of these figures the secretary of the miners' unions writes me: "We give you every guaranty that these figures are absolutely true. We accepted, in compiling these statistics, only such cases where we were sure that parents and physicians had answered our questions correctly. Actually conditions are much worse because those who suffer most do not answer at all." And this man writes the truth. It is grim, much worse . . .

This is the German famine district. It is not situated on the Vistula. There is no bad harvest, no civil war, no bolshevism which could be blamed for it. We enjoy peace. The recovery of our economic position goes on wonderfully. Germany has been saved from a second terrible revolution and bloodshed through the wisdom and bravery of the inhabitants. Perhaps the glorious realization will make it easier for them to die.

The ACHIEVEMENTS of The Amalgamated Bank of New York

In less than three years NEW YORK'S FIRST LABOR BANK has grown in resources from $500,000.00 the day it opened, to on February 11th, 1926.

While it has increased its surplus and reserves and paid quarterly dividends to its stockholders it has given special services to its depositors at a cost to them that is eloquent proof of the vital need of a LABOR BANK to the wage earners of every community.

Its usefulness will grow greater as the number of its depositors and clients increase. In the BANK'S new quarters with its UP-TO-THE-MINUTE Banking equipment it can do everything for YOU that other banks can do and in addition places at YOUR disposal THE SPECIAL SERVICES that Labor Banking was instituted to perform.

Visit the new Modern Bank-building and let its officers show you how the bank can SERVE YOU.

SO THE SECRETARY of Labor concurs in the decision of the inspectors excluding the Countess Cathcart. We are still of the opinion that this is an entirely unwarranted interpretation of the law and we are hopeful that judges will be found to see that there is no legal warrant for the position taken by the Government. The very section of the law cited by the Secretary is not convincing, for he declares that the Countess admitted the commission of a crime involving moral turpitude. Now, the Countess admitted adultery, but that is not a crime under South African law or United States law. It is a crime in New York and other blue-law States, but of that the federal authorities cannot take cognizance. Hence, we trust that the courts will find the Secretary in error and will overrule his decision. If necessary the case should be taken to the Supreme Court, even though the mischief has been done and this country has more than ever been made to appear as the Pharisee nation of the world. We urge—most earnestly—that before the shame of this decision passes a determined effort be made to induce Congress to amend the law so that its intent shall be beyond the possibility of further mishandling by dull and fumbling immigration inspectors, who are the last people in the world to be put in the position of censors of morals. They themselves would, we are sure, be happy to lose this duty.

IN THIS CONNECTION we owe an apology to Commissioner Curran and offer it, with sincere regret that, like the rest of the press, we were misled as to his powers and functions in the Cathcart case. It seems that he is merely an innocent bystander; that if an inspector detains an alien and rules him or her out, and if that decision is upheld by a board of three inspectors, the Commissioner has no more to do with the case than if he were the collector of the port of New Orleans. The report does not even go through his hands, but is sent direct by the board of inspectors to the Secretary of Labor. Our criticism should have been applied to the inspectors and not to the Commissioner. We therefore unqualifiedly withdraw our criticism of him and repeat our sorrow that we, as well as various other New York editors, were misled. We note with satisfaction that Commissioner Curran has announced his intention to appeal to Congress to alter the law so that he shall be really responsible for what happens on Ellis Island and shall not be again shouldered with a responsibility which is not his. He also, in a communication to the New York Herald Tribune of February 23, asks that Congress list precisely each offense for which persons shall be excluded so that there shall be no discretion vested in the inspecting officers. He is emphatic that adultery should not be included in the list as it is not a crime in most of the world. We are the happier to make this amend because, heretofore, in the offices he has held Mr. Curran has won the respect and praise of The Nation's editors, so much so that we could not understand this apparent lapse.

CLOSE ON THE HEELS OF THE Cathcart case comes the trial of Anthony Bimba in Brockton, Massachusetts, for declaring his disbelief in God. To punish this disbelief the district attorney has fallen back on a blue law which dates back approximately three hundred years, under which statute Thomas Paine and Robert G. Ingersoll could doubtless have been sent to jail. What preposterous folly and bigotry! The country is full of men who do not believe in a divine being, and reject all the superstition and idol worship of which our modern religion is still largely composed. Must they all go to jail? The district attorney declares that he will arrest Clarence Darrow if he should repeat in Brockton the speech he has been making all over the country. That may be consistency, but it is also crass stupidity. It has been followed up by a denial to Scott Nearing and Dudley Field Malone of halls in Brockton and Boston in which to discuss this case. Yet there are Americans who still say that this is a free country, that the Constitution is respected, and that free speech, the most precious birth-right of all Americans, is preserved! This case should also be taken to our highest court. It reminds us that there is no organization so much needed in this country today as the American Civil Liberties Union.

MUSSOLINI has backed water. Apparently frightened by the widespread condemnation of his threat of war against Germany, he has notified the Austrian Government that no Italian soldier will go over the Brenner Pass. His outrageous blustering, he explains, was meant only as a warning that Italy will never allow the union of Austria and Germany—a curious warning and a still more curious method of warning. So the Austrian Chancellor announces that he will not bring the issue to the attention of the League of Nations and will consider the matter closed. It cannot possibly have strengthened Mussolini at home, and it is to be hoped that he will use a more civil tongue hereafter. He remains, however, the greatest menace to peace in Europe. As long as he is in office he will also be a threat to the very existence of the League of Nations. But there is one sure way in which he can be controlled and that is through coal. Italy is without a pound of it and dependent upon England or the United States if Germany refuses to give her any. It behooves Italy, therefore, to give especial attention to the wishes of Great Britain, and for the statesmen of the latter country coal is a weapon of which they can make good use if they will do so patiently, and justly, and wisely.

“THE FUTURE OF THE LEAGUE [of Nations] as well as of the Locarno treaties is in deadly and immediate peril”; “the international political battle over the League Council seats is brewing one of the greatest crises the League has yet known.” No, these are not the statements of critics or enemies of the League. They are excerpts from dispatches to the New York World and Times. The former admits that Great Britain is ready to throw overboard the disarmament conference by a further postponement to September (after which it is to be forgotten), and declares that “almost any measures” are now justifiable to get Germany into the League and to save the Council from being swamped by new members. In its essence it is a fresh struggle between France and England within the League. France desires not only to have Poland as a permanent member of the Council to offset the accession of Germany, but wishes also to add to the Council Spain as a permanent member and three more temporary members. England feels that if this is done the Council is lost. As Viscount Grey points out, if you admit three or four besides Germany there will be immediate and serious embarrassments; “for every such addition there will arise several other claims equally meritorious.” He does not see where the line could be drawn and feels that with a large Council there would be every risk of that body’s being paralyzed in an emergency (as it was by Mussolini in the Corfu issue). Doubtless there will be Americans to say that if we were now in the Council we could guide its destinies and settle the question. For ourselves we rejoice once more that America is not mixed up in the daily intrigues and quarrels of Europe.

LOYD GEORGE’S land campaign takes on more serious import now that the general conference of Liberal Associations of England and Wales has given general assent to his scheme. There were some objections on the ground that it was socialistic, but the delegates, of whom there were 1,500, unanimously voted that the time has arrived for a radical reform of the land situation along the general lines laid down by Lloyd George. The Earl of Oxford and Asquith was careful to point out that no Liberal who dissented on this issue need leave the party. Lloyd George himself declared, however, that “Liberalism will not be bullied by the vested interests.” So he has now successfully boxed his way around the political compass and will probably once more find himself denounced as a dangerously socialistic firebrand as he used to be when he originally championed land reform. One thing is certain: this puts the Labor Party to its trumps on the land question. It must either stick to its more radical land proposals, of which we have heard little of late, or it must come to a compromise with the Liberals. In any event, the Liberals now have a fighting issue, but the Daily Herald believes it leaves Lloyd George friendless. As our readers will recall, we printed an account of the Lloyd George plan from the pen of our London contributing editor, Mr. J. A. Hobson, in our issue of November 11 last. The plan is to relieve all non-farming land-owners of their ownership, compensating them not by outright purchase but by a guaranteed annual rental assessed by a land court. The state itself is not, however, to farm, but to leave cultivation to practical farmers. As Mr. Hobson pointed out, it may take the efforts of a generation to set the plan afoot.

THE REJECTION OF THE NOMINATION of Thomas F. Woodlock by the Interstate Commerce Commission is most encouraging evidence that Congress continues to manifest its independence in dealing with Coolidge nominations. The refusal to confirm Charles B. Warren as Attorney General is, of course, the outstanding case, but recently the Senate Judiciary Committee has refused to report favorably the nomination for judge of Wallace McCamant, who nominated Mr. Coolidge for Vice-President in the 1920 convention. Mr. Woodlock has been serving on the Interstate Commerce Commission as a recess appointee; by a vote of seven to six he was rejected by a combination of Democrats and Republicans. Mr. Woodlock was opposed because of the bias in his writings in which his partisanship of the railroads has been obvious, because he has been registered and has voted as a Republican in recent years although appointed as a Democrat, and because of general resistance to the President’s policy of packing the various commissions in the interest of big business. In the matter of the debt settlement with Italy there seems also to be a disposition to decline to follow the President’s wishes.

INTEREST IN THE ANTHRACITE STRIKE and the hardships endured by the strikers and their families during the long months of struggle has served one unfortunate end. It has distracted public attention from the situation in other fields where the suffering is incomparably worse and in many cases has extended over a period of years instead of months. In West Virginia bituminous miners have been on strike for two and three years. They are living jammed together in shacks and tents; the regular relief from the union has been cut to $1 every two weeks for a family of four. A few groceries are distributed each week, but the dollar dole must cover everything else. In the bituminous district of Pennsylvania the situation is equally acute. Since last fall 2,000 families have been living in tents and subsisting on a pitifully insufficient union dole. In each case these conditions have grown out of the collapse of the Jacksonville Agreement of 1922. Throughout the bituminous field operators have attempted to ignore the agreement and over wide areas they have succeeded in establishing non-union conditions. Where the men have stuck by the agreement and refused to accept the operators’ terms, they have been driven to tent colonies and the uncertain support of a depleted union treasury. Where they have yielded and are working at non-union wages they are little better off. An Emergency Committee for Miners' Relief has been formed by the League for Industrial Democracy and the American Civil Liberties Union to collect money and clothing for the striking miners of these sections. There is particular need of warm clothing—especially for women and children. The office of the committee is Room 635, 799 Broadway, New York.

MILLIONS OF JEWS in every country in Europe are suffering economic privation or political oppression or both. Most of them must stay where they are; only a handful can hope to emigrate to the New World or fly to the uncertain blessings of the Palestinian homeland. To meet this widespread need requires more than generosity and good-will, though these are required on an enormous scale. The primary demand is for imagination—minds bold enough not to be staggered by the size of the task and its infinite variety. The work of establishing a secure and productive Jewish community is wholly different in Russia and in Rumania and in Palestine. It must be undertaken in each case in a different spirit and with different methods. But, by one way and another, it must be done. None of the necessary vision and courage seems to be lacking among the American Jews who are launching their great drive for fifteen million dollars—$6,990,000 of which will be raised in New York. And certainly they are possessed of the necessary generosity. They have gauged their financial program by the tremendous needs which they intend to meet, and they have planned the work with statesmanlike regard for the conditions in the countries where they will work. If it were only for the sake of their excellent Russian program this drive should succeed.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE DEATH of W. A. Sukhomlinov, the former Russian minister of war, recalls to mind one of the most sinister and least attractive figures in the pre-war period and the world conflict which followed. Sukhomlinov was one of the leading chauvinists of pre-war Russia, but when the test came he could not even demonstrate the courage of his convictions. Men like the Grand Duke Nicholas remained consistent, and proved equal to the crisis in throwing Russia into the war and showing themselves brave and competent soldiers afterward. But though Sukhomlinov inspired such inflammatory material as the famous article in the Birshewija Wjedomosti, reprinted in the Berlin Lokalanzeiger for June 14, 1914, which did as much as anything else to promote suspicion and bellicosity in Europe on the eve of the war, he lost his nerve at the last and "passed the buck" in the war office to Janushkevich, the chief of staff, who cooperated with Sazonov in putting through the fatal mobilization measures. During his notorious trial Sukhomlinov claimed that he had no responsibility for the Russian military acts from July 24, 1914, onward, but the statement was deemed incredible at the time. Nevertheless, the memoir of Dobrorolski, the diary of Baron Schilling, and the elaborate monograph of Professor Frantz establish the accuracy of Sukhomlinov's claim to innocence. During the war his incompetence was a leading cause of the collapse of the Russian military participation. His memoirs are voluminous and informing, but the notorious unreliability of the author makes it impossible to use them with assurance.

UNDER THE EDITORSHIP of David Lawrence, the Washington correspondent, a most interesting experiment is being undertaken in the capital—the publishing of a journal, the United States Daily, which will devote itself to recording the day-by-day activities of the federal Government. There will be no editorial page and no partisanship or propaganda of any kind, but a factual record of each department and bureau. Wherever possible this journal will present all important documents and decisions textually, and exact transcripts of hearings. If this work is well done the paper should become invaluable to all who are brought into contact with the Government, and to lawyers, editors, non-resident officials, our representatives abroad, librarians, etc. A record of this kind has been needed for years. If it is adequately indexed it will be a boon to all who have to keep informed of what the Government is doing. Associated with Mr. Lawrence are forty-eight prominent men and women, a number of whom have invested capital, and he will employ a staff of thirty reporters to begin with. It is a venture which deserves all success.

MARION TALLEY, the Kansas City song-bird whose rare gifts The Nation recorded three years ago, has made her debut at nineteen, accompanied by an amount of publicity which was unprecedented. If it does not ruin her we may all be thankful. Her voice, the critics agree, is one of extraordinary promise, a colorature soprano of large range, but one that needs much hard work if she is to be anything else than a nineteen-year-old wonder. A great artist does not "arrive" and complete his or her artistic education on a given day. The debut is but the beginning. There must be incessant musical labor, assiduous practice, and steady mental development if a great and well-rounded performer is to be created. There are disquieting signs that those nearest to this song-bird—whose debut at nineteen is not as unusual as most people believe—do not realize the necessity for years of the most devoted study and coaching if Marion Talley is definitely to take her place among the world's great artists.

WHETHER OR NOT ANY MOVING PICTURE yet made has a right to be considered a work of art when judged by the standards applicable to books, pictures, or plays is perhaps an open question; but whether it be answered in the affirmative or the negative two significant facts stand out: first, that some at least are infinitely superior to others and, second, that the superior films are all but lost in the vast quantity of trash which has submerged the country. It is, accordingly, an excellent plan which the International Film Arts Guild has formulated for giving a series of special performances of moving-picture "classics." It secured the Cameo Theater on Forty-second Street and during the week of January 31 it revived seven pictures of especial note, including "The Last Laugh," "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," and "A Woman of Paris." Several new foreign films are also promised, but the week of March 7 is to be devoted to eleven productions all made by Ernst Lubitsch, perhaps the most original of all modern directors. The Guild's experiment will serve to demonstrate whether or not there is an audience sufficiently interested in superior films to make a special effort to see them and it will also provide a better opportunity than has yet been had of evaluating on their own merits the best achievements of the screen.

Those Advisory Opinions

THE Senate rendered a great service to the Permanent Court of International Justice and to the countries of the world by its reservation on advisory opinions. The original Swanson resolution provided that the United States was not to be bound by any advisory opinion rendered in accordance with the statute of the World Court. One wonders what the draftsman meant, for the statute makes no provision whatever for advisory opinions. Only the Covenant of the League of Nations permits these. The alleged caveat against being bound was futile and disingenuous; nobody is legally bound by an advisory opinion, neither the Court, nor the Council, nor the member nations.

That is why Mr. Root and eminent judges have considered such opinions non-judicial in character. Yet they are and may be used as political spring-boards by the Council of the League, and this is what has happened in several cases. That the Council is not bound is shown by the result of the two Polish-German advisory opinions, in neither of which cases did the Council carry out the advisory opinion. In both of these cases, however, the Council made political agreements with Poland which denied to the winning parties, the German minorities, many of the safeguards which the advisory opinions were designed to afford them. Nor was Turkey "bound" by the advisory opinion in the Mosul case. Yet look at Turkey and note what has happened.

In the Mosul opinion Turkey declined to be represented. Nevertheless, the advisory opinion was rendered and all the reservations to the effect that Turkey was "not bound" by the opinion were utterly futile. Turkey was deprived of Mosul, notwithstanding the report of the committee of jurists that Mosul was under Turkish sovereignty and could not be detached, therefore, without Turkish consent. It is well known that Curzon made a definite promise to the Turks that Mosul would not be dealt with except by unanimous vote of the Council on which Turkey was to be represented. It was on this understanding that Article 3 of the Lausanne Treaty was signed. The Council has the power, under the flexible provisions of Articles 12 to 16 of the Covenant, to have carried out Curzon's promise. (See Foreign Affairs, London, January, 1926, page 191.) The Turks subsequently found, through the aid of the Court, that Curzon could not make such a promise. The Court tells Turkey that it did not rely on Curzon's promise, notwithstanding Turkey's insistence that it did.

The Court speaks in the Mosul opinion about "the prestige of the League of Nations" having to be preserved. This does not seem very judicial. Moreover, in a litigated case, the statute of the Court provides that a non-member state shall be represented on the Court ad hoc by a judge of its own nationality. Had the Mosul question, therefore, been a litigated case, Turkey would have had a judge on the Court. By converting a litigated case into a request for an advisory opinion made by the Council upon the Court, even an opinion as to the Council's own power, this safeguard of nations unwilling to litigate is destroyed.

The Court refers to the fact that on the Council Turkey could not be represented nor Britain either, because they would be judges in their own case. But it will be observed that Lord Finlay was a judge on the Court that rendered the advisory opinion and Turkey had no representative on that Court. Thus, by converting the question into a request for an advisory opinion, Turkey's safeguard of representation on the Court that rendered the decision is destroyed.

It may be proper to remark that the Council of the League of Nations, as appeared in the Official Journal of November, 1923, pages 1335-1337, 1501-1502, censured the Court in the Eastern Carelia case for its refusal to give the advisory opinion requested in that case involving Russia, although Russia was not represented. Only the strenuous efforts of some of the judges prevented what would have been a disastrous step, for not taking which Judge Bustamante in his recent book still criticizes the Court—wrongly, in our estimation.

The Senate reservation, if accepted, will materially weaken the Council's power over the Court and prevent the abuse of the advisory opinion practice so as to obtain control over nations unwilling to litigate or to consent to such opinions. It reads:

That the Court shall not render any advisory opinion, except publicly after due notice to all states adhering to the Court and to all interested states, and after public hearing, or opportunity for hearing, given to any state concerned; nor shall it, without the consent of the United States, entertain any request for an advisory opinion touching any dispute or question in which the United States has or claims an interest.

Thus the Court is relieved of embarrassment and political danger to its life by avoiding requests for opinions in secret, for which there was some sympathy in the Court, and probably for decisions over absent or unwilling nations. If the reservation is accepted, which is not yet certain, an opinion like that in the Mosul case may become very rare. All states "concerned" in an opinion must be heard or given an opportunity to be heard in public before an opinion can be rendered. The meaning of "opportunity for hearing" will have to be worked out by the Court and by public opinion. This is a help to small states over whom the Council would seek to exert political control. It is doubtful who is the judge of whether a country is "concerned"—the Council or the nation giving notice of its concern.

There is no doubt, however, that the United States is the judge of whether it "claims an interest," and our mere assertion of such interest, without our express consent that an opinion be given, will bar the Court's jurisdiction over practically every question affecting the American continent, north or south, and possibly over other questions. This reservation materially weakens the power of the League in the Americas at least, and constitutes a victory for Senator Borah's contentions. Will all members of the League and Court protocol accept the reservation? Will Argentina, Brazil, and Chile? The answer is doubtful. If the larger European Powers accept, it will probably be an important indication that they are willing to make large concessions for our further approach to their political enterprises—for few seriously expect us to submit a case to the Court.

The reservations open up a large vista of disputed and doubtful questions which will need the interpretation of more than one judicial and political body. Neither the World Court nor the Senate reservations constitute serious steps in the direction of world peace.

Our Naval and Army Waste

ON one day, February 16, the two houses of Congress voted appropriations of no less than $660,925,940 for national defense. Of this vast amount $339,300,000 was in the army bill, which was passed by the House without a record vote. In the Senate the navy bill, containing $321,495,940, slipped through easily. On the same day it was announced that the House Naval Committee had agreed to a five-year naval aviation program, costing $100,000,000, to be expended at the rate of $20,000,000 a year. With this sum we are to build two dirigibles, each three times the size of the ill-fated Shenandoah; a metal-clad dirigible; and one thousand new airplanes—all of this despite the fact that no progress whatsoever has been made in remedying the conditions in the army and navy brought out by General Mitchell and other reliable witnesses. We are going ahead trusting the expenditure of this vast sum to the same people who have shown their incompetence, with the inevitable result that we shall have extremely little to produce for the expenditures and shall probably see the three dirigibles go out of business as rapidly as did the Shenandoah.

Since 1885 the United States has spent no less than eight billions of dollars upon its navy alone. For the fiscal year 1923 the appropriations were $322,532,908; for 1926 they fell to $317,000,000, and for 1927 they have again gone up $4,500,000. The Senate restored to the bill two items, aggregating $9,000,000, for new airplanes and aircraft equipment, and for continuing the Lakehurst air station, which had been struck out by the House. In the navy, therefore, the Coolidge policy of economy will have resulted in decreased appropriations of $1,500,000 over 1923. If to this is annually added the $20,000,000 recommended by the House Naval Committee we shall be spending about $19,000,000 a year more on our navy.

Not the least discouraging feature is that so vast an appropriation as that of the army bill can be jammed through the House without adequate discussion or analysis. We are particularly disappointed that the Progressive group in the House did not at least offer an amendment putting a definite limit on the number of reserve officers and forbidding the use of regular army officers or men in the high schools of the country. The fact is that there are now approximately 90,000 reserve officers who have been commissioned since the war. If the War Department continues its policy of commissioning them without limit there will soon be more reserve officers than there are soldiers and officers in the entire regular army. Since these reserve officers are not paid and have to purchase their own equipment Congress has not interfered. The result is that the General Staff is building up in these officers another military machine which is already exerting pressure on Congress for larger and larger appropriations. Congressmen and Senators who dare to speak out against our drifting into old-fashioned German militarism find themselves assailed by letters from reserve officers throughout their States. The effort of the War Department to muzzle those reserve officers who happen to have liberal opinions was brought out in the case of Captain Paxton Hibben. Press dispatches stated after the first mobilization day that it was the intention of the War Department to place one reserve officer in every community as a center of militaristic and nationalistic propaganda hidden under the name of patriotism. Where is this Prussianization to stop?

But this is not the only subject into which both House and Senate ought to delve before passing such an appropriation bill. The army itself is scandalously over-officered, while its regiments are depleted and many of its companies are nothing less than a corporal's guard, partly because of the effort to keep in existence so many regimental organizations and because of the evil of detached duties. The entire service is discouraged by the present management, and some of the best officers, like two of the world fliers, are quitting the service. More would go if they could find opportunities outside. Yet we have a huge list of generals and colonels and we are actually able to detach no fewer than 768 officers for teaching at colleges and schools. Most of the training given by these officers is absolutely worthless from the strictly military point of view. It is their military propaganda which the War Department values. Since the ablest gymnastic instructors in the country are agreed on the worthlessness of two drills a week from the physical point of view, Congress ought to abolish the whole thing. But Congress does just what the War Department asks, and this in the face of the fact that the majority's President, Mr. Calvin Coolidge, in his speech before the American Legion on October 6, declared that "no nation ever had an army large enough to guarantee it against attack in time of peace or to insure its victory in time of war," and asserted that everyone knew that the old military systems and "reliance on force have failed." Yet we go ahead squandering half billions on force. And the practice goes on because nobody or no group in Congress is determined to call a halt or study this question of defense intelligently.

Henry Holt

NOT the least impressive thing about Henry Holt in his old age was his physical appearance. It has been said of him that his carriage and his countenance seemed in themselves sufficient support for the notion that "there were giants in those days." Straight and benign, he walked Fifth Avenue or the carpets of the Authors' Club with an erect air and a commanding eye. The face beneath the high gray hair was the face of one who had met many ideas and many men and had not been daunted. It was a huge face, such as one looks for in great persons, and latterly it was a cavernous one—dark eyes set deep under a powerful brow, massive surfaces accentuated by sharply intrenched lines, and a firm though kindly mouth and chin. He lived as he liked, rising late after long evenings spent in conversation with chosen friends. He was a good talker, one who in the capacity of publisher had done a great deal more than sign contracts and pay royalties; and the complaint was not infrequently heard from wives of much younger men that Mr. Holt had kept these companions too long at the table or in the depths of leather chairs at the club.

His circle of friends was one of the most distinguished which a man in his day could have had. There was John Hay; there was the geologist, Clarence King; there was Raphael Pumpelly; there was E. L. Godkin; there was W. P. Trent; and there was Henry Adams. Henry Adams, sending the manuscript of his anonymous novel "Democracy" to Mr. Holt in 1879, trusted his friend to keep silent concerning its authorship, and the trust was not betrayed.

One of the last things written by Mr. Holt was a preface to a new edition of "Democracy," in which the circumstances attending its publication and reception were detailed. All that is interesting, but another portion of the same preface is more interesting still:

There is no disguising the fact that . . . the quality of those books produced today is so far short of satisfying the demand for the best that readers of good judgment are noticeably turning to the literature of earlier and happier ages. . . . Of course, there are many causes for the limited literary production of our age, as there are for everything else, but perhaps the most noticeable is the fact that, whereas in the great Victorian era, which spread over our country as well as over England—in the days of Thackeray, Dickens, George Eliot, Hawthorne, Holmes, Irving, and their compeers—it was thought a little infra dig. for a college graduate to go into business, and now if one does not go into a business a majority of his companions consider him a fool; in other words, most men, including those possessing the acutest minds, are bent on money-making, and very few on anything else. Many a respectable old institution has more students of cookery, housekeeping, and farming . . . than of the humanities, on a familiarity with which the production of good literature largely depends.

If such a passage stamps its author as Victorian, the kind of Victorianism displayed is not the kind of which one wishes to make light. Mr. Holt seems to have been wrong about the literature of the twentieth century, which certainly is not a limited literature; and doubtless he never fully comprehended the extent of Henry Adams's pessimism concerning those "earlier and happier ages." Doubtless, too, he did not take great pains to understand the efforts made during his latter years by such brilliant youths as Randolph Bourne to fashion a new culture based upon the data of industry and intellect and engineering. But such failures are excusable in a man so old, and particularly in a man who had served so well a great though passing tradition. Mr. Holt had done enough when he embraced the classic liberalism of his own century, and when, through John Fiske and Herbert Spencer, he accepted the best scientific thought available in the eighties to an educated person. Hence the record achieved by his house in the publication of scientific books, and hence, later on, the picturesque journal which Mr. Holt, between his seventy-fourth and his eightieth years, conducted in an effort to restore dignity and balance to the discussion of fundamental themes. The Unpartizan Review, which went its way several years ago, is more fitting as a monument to the closing period of Mr. Holt's life than are the two large volumes of his treatise on "The Cosmic Relations." These researches into immortality and things psychical might emphasize the will of a leonine man who did not want his personality to die; but they were far from John Fiske, and they were infinitely out of harmony with Henry Adams.

The chief distinction of Mr. Holt, after all, was that he was an educated publisher. There have never been many of his kind, and there are none too many now. A good publisher will be a good business man, and Henry Holt was that; but in addition he will possess a disinterested love of wisdom and good literature, will know how to talk more than gossip with his best authors, and will be capable of some degree of authorship himself. American publishing was never in a more enlightened or flourishing state than it is at present. Its state would be something like perfect if all of its representatives were equipped as was Henry Holt.

A Handbook for Rebels

TWO things are necessary for the complete revolutionary: a belief, utter and profound and unquestioning, in the cause he fights for and a total unconcern about his personal welfare. A keen mind is useful, and a sharp tongue. A sense of humor is an asset—seldom found, to be sure, in combination with these other qualities—and a philosophical turn of mind is almost essential. But belief and courage are absolute requirements.

An example for revolutionaries of all ages is to be found in the chronicles of the early Quakers, a group of rebels whose daring and impudence and utter devotion have never been outdone in all history. Their story, vividly told by Mary Agnes Best in "Rebel Saints"* (chapters of which appeared originally in The Nation), is one of blood-chilling adventure. As she says in her first chapter:

Their lives were lurid. . . . They sailed the Seven Seas in leaky tubs, and ran afoul the Algerian pirates before Commodore Decatur was born or thought of. . . . In Old and New England vivisection was practiced on them—tortures too brutal to repeat to sensitive modern ears. They glutted English jails, and the convict ships on which they were deported afforded them hardly more than standing-room only.

Such was their life—their inevitable, day-by-day existence. No Russian worker on the barricades faced more certain suffering or faced it with a higher heart. And their cause was in their day quite as revolutionary as his was in 1905. They opposed the church which was everywhere synonymous with authority and the established order. They opposed the Puritans in England under Cromwell and in Massachusetts under Endicott. They opposed the Church of England under the Restoration. They faced the Catholic inquisition and argued with the Mohammedan Turks. Wherever they went—and they went everywhere—they preached the right of the individual to worship God in his own way. And this was sedition. It was sedition because religion was a matter of law; and it was sedition because, as is always the case, this one form of radicalism begot others. The individual man was in the eyes of God as good as his neighbor and, for that matter, as good as his master. From this simple Christian doctrine sprang dangerous beliefs of all sorts: equality between the sexes was taught and practiced; all gestures and forms of address intimating respect for rank or age or authority were abandoned; war, or the taking of life for any reason, was discountenanced; the laws of the state themselves were laughed at when they lacked the support of conscience.

Naturally, the whole system of society stiffened itself against a faith which would cheerfully have knocked its props out from under it in the name of the Lord. The Quakers were tortured and killed—and feared. On their side they combined with a habit of reckless daring a method of absolute non-resistance, for the essence of their revolution would have been lost if they had used the weapons which they ever sought to destroy. But their propaganda widened the actual area of individual liberty and established in men's minds an ideal of justice yet to be achieved. And their method—peaceful and persuasive, but stubborn and irreverent and careless of death—might well be adopted by rebels of all breeds as a model of revolutionary technique.

The Universe, Inc. By H. v. L.

THIS JOB is not as easy as it seems and is full of heartbreaks; for, after you have read the papers all week long to make a witty picture, and have courted triple pneumonia to get it to The Nation on time, asking the postmaster of New York to deliver it himself, and have got it past the Editorial Board and then through the lithographer's shop and finally on the news-stands, only three minutes late, you usually discover that your joke about prohibition was that very morning quite killed by Bishop Manning and that your wit about the coal strike is now as useless as the stuff your coal dealer sold you last week for "real anthracite."

WHEREFORE I have decided to give up studying the local press for reliable information about the future; and henceforth I shall fill this page only after consultation with New York's 79,537 spook doctors and soothsayers. Watch for results.

Benito and I Save the St. Paul

A Stirring Chapter in International High Finance

By WILLIAM HARD

Washington, February 17

THE trouble with the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company is that it owes $55,000,000 to the United States Government and has to pay 6 per cent annually on it. This comes out at $3,300,000 annually.

My accounting department has figured out that the interest which the St. Paul pays the Government is 15.11 per cent of its annual fixed charges. If we can get rid of this difficulty we shall be well on our way to getting the St. Paul out of bankruptcy and out of the hands of receivers.

I have seen how it can be done.

My first step is that I shall sell the St. Paul to Benito Mussolini. He is the man who has the big drag with the American Government. His policies endear him to the American Government. On behalf of his other property, Italy, he has been able to get most advantageous terms from the American Government. I shall sell the St. Paul to him.

In the meantime, at Rome, I shall have explained to him the St. Paul's "capacity to pay." This is like numerous other phrases in diplomacy; and it, therefore, means incapacity to pay. One of the greatest permanent assets that a country can now have is a temporary incapacity to pay. When I explain to Mussolini the St. Paul's incapacity to pay, he will at once see what a valuable property it is, if owned by a European government.

I will then organize a St. Paul Debt Funding Commission. When certain of our American States repudiated some of their debts they called it adjusting them. That was a poor word. It indirectly implied some reduction. Funding is a much nobler word, and more diplomatic. It implies that you will pay all you owe, and yet you don't. It is in the highest traditions of diplomacy. It says the maximum and comes across with the minimum.

So I shall have a St. Paul Debt Funding Commission. But I shall then put in the word which will turn the trick. I shall call it—and it will be—the Italian St. Paul Debt Funding Commission.

I shall sail from Genoa. What notice would be taken of me if I started from Minneapolis? None. So I shall start from Genoa. I shall have with me numerous titled personages. One of the present difficulties of the St. Paul is that it has no counts or princes. I shall bring counts and princes in profusion.

As I leave Genoa on the Benito Caesare, I shall send out a radio saying that complete proofs of the St. Paul's incapacity to pay are lying in the hold of the ship, all written out in the Italian language. They never were convincing in English to our Treasury Department. But you ought to see them in Italian! In Italian they are an absolute knock-out. Bankruptcy in English leaves you cold. Bankruptcy in any foreign language makes any American official break down and cry.

I shall arrive in New York. There I will consent to attend a lunch given by the organization called the American Friends of St. Paul Irredenta. At this lunch I shall make a speech. In my peroration I shall say:

The world is now one. The age of isolation has passed. Everybody now has a right to live off everybody else. In the days of ox-carts you had to pay your debts. Now you can go across the Atlantic in five days. This makes everything different. Now the prosperity of one is the prosperity of all. Nothing reduces anybody's prosperity like paying debts. So the paying of any debt by anybody is a direct attack on the prosperity of everybody else. What we must seek is a free world, free from all those discordant notes which till now have made the whole human race look forward with terror and demoralization to the first of the next month. That is what we must seek, and to that great and lofty cause I here and now dedicate the whole remainder of my life.

Cheered by the applause which this speech will elicit, I shall proceed to Washington. There I shall be photographed on the steps of the Treasury with Mr. Mellon. No previous emissary from the St. Paul has ever been photographed on the steps of the Treasury with Mr. Mellon. But I shall come from Genoa.

Also there will be dinner parties given for me by the charmingest hostesses in Washington. They paid no attention to the woes of the St. Paul when forwarded to Washington from Minnesota. I will succeed in pouring into their ears all the woes of the St. Paul through my counts and princes from the Eternal City. Thus also, in talk after dinner, I shall for the first time get the woes of the St. Paul fully into the minds and pens of this country's most distinguished political writers. I shall for the first time make the St. Paul fashionable. I shall then approach Mr. Mellon and say:

"I suggest that the St. Paul pay its $55,000,000 over a period of sixty-two years and that, instead of paying 6 per cent all the time, it pay no per cent at all during the first five years, and then one-eighth of one per cent during the next ten years, and then one-fourth of one per cent during the next ten years, and so on, until we come to the last seven years of the sixty-two-year period, when actually the St. Paul will pay 2 per cent."

"Why such terms?" Mr. Mellon will say.

"Why?" I will rejoin indignantly. "Why, because you gave those terms to Benito last time; and this time, with the St. Paul, he is much more bankrupt than he ever was with Italy."

"Certainly," Mr. Mellon will say. "I catch the point. What you demand is bare justice. You shall have it."

I will then give out an interview proclaiming Mr. Mellon's victory.

My accounting department has figured out what I shall thus save to the St. Paul by getting for it the justice that has been accorded to Italy. I shall save for it $3,300,000 in each of the next five years and from approximately $2,500,000 to $2,000,000 in each of the remaining fifty-seven of the fixed sixty-two-year period.

Mussolini and I will then take a modest tip of $5,000,000 apiece for our services; and I will then sell the St. Paul back to its original owners. I will sell it back completely restored financially and completely ready to confer abounding prosperity upon the great Northwest. By merely Italianating this railroad for a short space of time, I shall have solved the greatest industrial economic problem in America.

The president of the St. Paul, under my directions, will then do his best to imitate Mussolini in every way. He will take a reasonable part of the money which Mussolini and I have saved for him and will spend it on buying black shirts for his toughest employees and on giving castor oil to Senator Frazier of North Dakota and on assassinating Senator Shipstead of Minnesota.

As for me, I shall take my $5,000,000 and lend it to the St. Paul at 8 per cent. If Mussolini can pay real interest rates to Morgan and Company after being rescued by Mr. Mellon, the St. Paul can pay real interest rates to me after being rescued by me.

Then Dwight Morrow will ask to leave Morgan and Company and join me. Then I will dine with the President any time. So everything will all work out in a beautiful circle, and the St. Paul will be in as high society as if it were a foreign government, and the farmers of the Northwest will be happy, and I shall be fixed for life.

The only way to get ahead in this world is by lending a helping hand. The only way to climb upward in this modern changed world is by self-sacrifice. Just a little self-sacrifice by the tax-payers of the United States will make the St. Paul solvent and me rich and themselves prosperous.

Is there any catch in this argument? Where is it? I defy any really modern thinker to find it.

The Battle of Jackson's Hole

By STRUTHERS BURT

IN the extreme western part of the State of Wyoming, forty miles south of the southern border of Yellowstone Park and on the western slope of the Continental Divide, is a mountain valley, sixty miles long by fifteen wide, that is not only one of the most beautiful in the world but which, somewhat to its own surprise, is suddenly finding itself famous as well. For scenery it has always been famous: to the west are the Tetons, the finest mountains in America, not even barring the Canadian mountains; in the thick timber, north, east, west, and south, are a score of gem-like lakes—Owen Wister and Theodore Roosevelt have both spoken of this country as the loveliest Far Western country we have; for big game it has long been equally famous, as it is the home of the biggest elk herd in existence, somewhere around twenty thousand head, not to mention quantities of other game; but only recently has it begun to emerge as the battleground of two opposing philosophies, the field upon which will be fought the first serious conflict concerning one of the most pressing questions now confronting the American public.

The question is conservation, and its concrete aspect, in regard to the valley, is whether Yellowstone Park shall extend its southern borders so as to take in the Teton Range and its southeastern borders, so as to include the headwaters of the Yellowstone River and what is known as the Thoroughfare Country, the mountainous country, ridden by the Continental Divide, through which run the trails leading from Jackson's Hole to the South Fork of the Shoshone River and Cody. Both are comparatively small territories, as such things go in the Far West, and territories with practically no settlement on them.

This is no new question. Yellowstone Park has always wanted these additions and the incorporation of the Teton Range with the park has been recommended for years, notably by Mr. Roosevelt while President. The reasons advanced by the National Parks Service are clear and sensible, but to understand them fully one must bear in mind the history of Yellowstone Park itself.

Yellowstone Park was the first park planned, and the heroic little band of men who explored it and decided that it must be made a ward of the Government were exploring unknown and unsurveyed country. As a result they suggested an arbitrary oblong that did not take into account several things: first, that the Tetons were a natural part of the park and supplied a grandeur of scenery otherwise lacking save in the canyon of the Yellowstone River; second, that the headwaters of the Yellowstone River were also a natural part of the park; and third, that since the park is a reservation and must be protected, its lines, wherever possible, should follow the top of a divide and thus simplify the heartbreaking work of the park rangers in heavy snow. At present the rangers face an almost impossible task, as the arbitrary lines take no account of canyons or swamps or impassable country, and all along the eastern border of the park and to some extent along the southern there are wedges, similar to those known in military strategy, where poachers can work practically at their own sweet will. Other reasons arose later. For instance, the headwaters of the Yellowstone are the breeding grounds of a special species of moose, and it is history that whenever these moose begin to get a really good start the State of Wyoming opens the hunting season on them and issues a certain number of bull licenses. Anyone who knows the country knows that it is populated most of the time by widowed cows.

These arguments, and many more, are so irrefutable and pressing that there would seem to be no two sides to the question until—as is always the case—the arguments of the other side are studied. Here a curious shift in ground is noticeable, and it is this that makes the problem no longer merely a local one but one of perpetual and spreading importance.

When, directly after the war, the proposed addition to Yellowstone Park—"park extension" it is now called—began to be vigorously pushed the strongest opposition came from Wyoming cattlemen and sheepmen, who saw a possible future range being taken from them, from the Forest Service, under whose control the land was, and from the State administration, which was jealous of federal encroachment. As time went on the opposition of the first group and of the State was seen to be largely fictitious. All the land under debate was already in the hands of the Forest Service, it did not belong to the State of Wyoming and never would, it had never been open to grazing and never would be. The presentation of these facts, however, did not in any degree abate the ardor of the enemies of the plans. Through various permutations, through a process of elimination, they fell back upon what from the beginning had been their main objection, an inherent dislike of federal control and an inherent hatred of any interference with individual action—prejudices well understood and sympathized with by any native or adopted Westerner, but not always to be recommended without further consideration. The fact that the Forest Service already controlled the land made no difference; the enemies of the new plan were used to the Forest Service and by its very nature they could do more with it than they could with this new government bureau—the National Parks Service—whose objects, in so many ways, were different.

And there, whether the adherents and opponents of park extension know it or not, the question rests today. It is no longer an argument whether Yellowstone Park should logically increase its territory and rectify its borders, it has come to be an argument whether conservation itself shall be hampered or, even more, done away with. It is the truth that never before in its history, save at the beginning, has the whole theory of conservation been in such danger as it is at this moment. Anyone with knowledge knows this by reading between the lines of the proposed congressional investigation of all government lands. The attack has been gathering strength for some time; it is powerful, subtle, and dangerous.

Roughly speaking, the opposing forces line up as follows: In favor of park extension are probably 40 per cent. of the inhabitants of the valley and 40 per cent. of the rest of Wyoming and the Far West. Behind them is practically all the conservation sentiment throughout the country: all game and protective societies, all magazines and newspapers whose editorial policies permit of idealism, and every individual, in Congress or out, whose attention has been called to the question and who, provided his mind has not already been determined by other reasons, realizes the deeper import. Opposed to park extension are most of the Far Western congressional delegations, probably 60 per cent. in the valley, the State, and the remainder of the Rocky Mountain region, all Far Western sentiment of the "booster" variety, and much Far Western sentiment of the "leave-us-alone" variety. But not all of the last—not by any means.

The "old timer" is a thinker and he is where he is because he dislikes crowds, especially when ill-regulated, and because in a way he is an idealist. To put his position simply, he would much prefer no government interference whatsoever, but having for a number of years watched with increasing alarm the selfish, destructive, frequently idiotic advance of so-called civilization he is frequently not averse to employing any means to save at least a few of the more dramatic localities with which he is familiar. He is a rough and ready economist and an experienced man, and all the pamphlets in the world, State, government, or from local chambers of commerce, cannot prove to him certain things he knows to be false. He knows, for instance, that the Far West is a large and thinly settled country, and that most of it will remain so, and he knows that many parts of it have just three assets, and some parts only the two latter—game, scenery, and game. He knows that none of these thrive except where population is intelligently limited. He has seen the farmer come and be ruined, and, while running himself, ruin the natural wealth of the locality where he has settled, and he has arrived at the conclusion that if man individually cannot behave himself sensibly then the government had better help him.

As to the inhabitants of the valley—and what they think is most important, since Congress would not act except on the assumption that at least a strong minority was in favor of extension—sentiment is so mixed and the causes for this mixed sentiment so varied that it is difficult to describe it adequately. It is safe to say, however, that the majority are in the position of the "old timer" elsewhere—most of them are "old timers," most of them are idealists. The object, therefore, of most of them is to save the country they love. There is little disagreement fundamentally, the disagreement arises as to method.

Personal points of view are frequently forcible arguments. Let me give my own experience, since I have been a resident of the valley for seventeen years. In the beginning I was bitterly opposed to park extension and remained so for some time. The country was getting along fairly well as it was and, being by adoption and sympathy a Far Westerner, I wanted just as little control as possible. Besides, I did not know anything about the National Parks Service and I had heard a good many untruths concerning its autocratic and repressive measures. That was about seven years ago. Meantime I watched my country and the advent of the automobile alone would have changed my mind even if half a dozen other factors had not been at work.

I saw this: I saw my country attacked by every known variety of water-power man, land-scheme man, and ruthless get-rich-quick man; I saw its natural and priceless assets sneered at and held in contempt, and stupid attempts made to level it down, of course unsuccessfully, but none the less destructively, to the common denominator of other countries utterly different in altitude and situation. I saw, each year, the increasing hordes of automobile tourists sweep the country like locusts and the gradual opening up of everything to them without the slightest perception of their own best interests or the realization that there existed other and equally important philosophies and vital, fundamental human desires. In short, I saw at work the old American passion for killing the goose, both spiritual and physical, that lays the golden eggs. The motorist alone was coming into the country because of its beauty and its peace, and yet everything was being done to destroy the very things for which the motorist was coming.

And while this was going on I was watching north of me, and more and more intimately, a government bureau at work on practically the same problems, and the more I watched this government bureau the more I came to the conclusion that, within its province, and with the exception of the Forest Service, it was the wisest, most far-seeing, fairest, most courteous, and unselfish branch of the Government I had ever seen; and, moreover, that it was not so hampered as the Forest Service; in short, it was the only branch of the Government, dealing with natural resources, that could take into account the wishes and necessities of every man.

Conservation is a large word and an ugly one, and, like all words, it was invented after the fact and not before it. As it is used in this article it first came into common practice about two decades ago when a number of disinterested men, led by Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot, began to see that a century and a half of wild and selfish expenditure of natural resources had come to an end and that this expenditure must be guarded and regulated if America was to remain America and not eventually become China. But the idea of conservation has been in the human mind ever since the first man saw another man come up over a hill, and as population has grown the idea has become more and more clearly indicated. It has two sides: first, the necessity of conserving natural resources; second, man's belief, conscious or otherwise, that space, solitude, and fresh air, at least for part of the time, are necessary to produce men and women somewhere near his ideal.

Now, there are just two ways of preserving natural resources and the necessary space that man must have. They can be preserved aristocratically or they can be preserved democratically. If left to itself any forest will in time find itself non-existent, as are the forests of Syria today, and although solitude and space will come back they will be the solitude and space of a desert. In Europe this problem was settled, without any conscious thought or program, by the process whereby the powerful seized all the space and natural resources they wanted and the weak received none at all. The result, even physically, upon the population is easily seen. The upper classes of Europe are often magnificent physically; the lower classes are sometimes—especially in England—almost dehumanized. But, whatever we may think of the rights or wrongs of a certain situation, in America problems have to be settled democratically; and the problem of conservation, therefore, will have to be settled by government bureaus.

To settle the first half of the conservation problem, the half having to do with the preservation of natural resources, the Forest Service was organized. At the time it occurred to no one that within a few decades the population would so increase and invention would so hasten its movements that the second half of the problem, the question of solitude, space, and fresh air, would speedily become a pressing question too; but a pressing question it has become and to meet it—to take over what intervals of solitude, space, and fresh air had already been set aside and to plan for new ones—the National Parks Service was also formed. Between these two bureaus much of the history of the Far West must be written.

The Forest Service has had a magnificent record. Organized just in time, encountering at first bitter opposition, it saved the Far West, and today the Far West is unanimously its friend. But it is a "use" bureau. It was founded as a "use" bureau and it can never be anything else. In other words, any man who has a legitimate scheme—taking into account, of course, individual discretion on the part of the local supervisor—can put that scheme into operation on a forest reserve provided that he obeys the rules. "Individual discretion," naturally, is wide, but the Forest Service cannot refuse a legitimate petition and remain completely legitimate itself. It cannot, therefore, meet the second problem of conservation at all, the problem that has suddenly become as important as the first one, the problem that becomes each year more compelling as the pressure of life and population increases. Nor does this apply only to the Far West. Wherever there is any great scenic beauty and local conditions make such a step possible, this scenic beauty should be set aside and administered for the good of the people. This is not sentiment; it is common sense and good business and—a very encouraging advance—it is not challenged today by any but selfish interests. Most of the land now controlled by the Government should be, and always will be, administered by the Forest Service. It should be administered, that is, as an intelligent business scheme. But some of the land, and a great deal of land not yet in government control, should be set aside to meet the growing needs of the other half of the conservation problem and should be administered by a bureau that is purely recreational in its intent. This recreational urge, this desire and need for solitude, space, and fresh air, cannot be assuaged solely by scenery or even by unoccupied land; it must be assuaged by scenery that is just as nature meant it to be and by land that is untouched by sawmill or water-power plant or the dust of herds of sheep.

Needs are needs long before they are recognized as such. There was need for the Forest Service years before it was organized, and at first, as has been said, its path was a rocky one. The National Parks Service is still young and in many ways its history is duplicating that of its older sister. Millions of Americans, although in their secret hearts they know better, are not yet quite willing to admit that scenery in itself is a business asset, that solitude is a necessity, or that land is good for anything but to grow crops—trees, grain, or hay—that can be cut down. Fortunately, there are millions of other men more advanced in their theories, and especially fortunate is the excellent feeling existing between the Forest Service and the National Parks Service, a feeling that has always been good, but which is now warmer than ever on account of what is known as a common danger.

Because of this common danger and because men realize with dismay a world that is becoming hourly more noisy and hasty and destructive, the eyes of all those interested in conservation are today turning toward this small mountain valley—this Jackson's Hole—where one of the first decisive battles of conservation will be fought out.

Body Beleaguered

By JESSICA NELSON NORTH

Temple of God, in vain despoilers sought you
In that far house where pleasure was your master,
Before the image of an old disaster
Sped us abroad.

See to how stark a hiding I have brought you,
Footweary of your weight,
Divinest freight.

Here in our doubtful stronghold of the rocks
We watch the torn sky graying
Toward the equinox,
While distant echoes with autumnal baying
Scare us to cover like a frightened fox.

Now none heed
We share the portion of the starveling sparrow
Or, suppliant, crouch at the squirrel's board.
Oh further yet
Into what meager fortress must I bear you,
Ark of my cloudy and diminished Lord?

Negroes in College

By W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

THE trouble at Fisk University last year opened the eyes of many people. They realized that the problems of higher education were by no means confined to white students. Here was a Negro college where the students not only had no voice in their own government but could not edit a college paper, could not have an athletic association, and could not have any organization without faculty participation. And when the students openly rebelled, they were expelled and some of them put in jail. Since then Fisk University has cleaned house. The former president and most of the faculty have gone and the trustees are trying to rebuild the institution on broader and better lines.

But the sort of difficulty that culminated in the trouble at Fisk is found in many other institutions and this is true notwithstanding the fact that the American Negro is striving for higher education as never before. In the school year 1924-1925, 752 Negroes received their first degree in arts, 44 were made masters in arts, 4 received their doctorates in philosophy and science, and 6 were elected to the Phi Beta Kappa; while 395 received professional degrees. But this represents a minimum, accomplished through great difficulty and discouragement and is not half or perhaps a third of what the American Negro could and would do today if properly encouraged.

We may divide the institutions which educate Negroes into three classes: those which are taught mainly by whites but attended only by Negro students; those which are taught mainly by Negroes and are attended by Negroes; and the general educational institutions of the land. In all these there is today more or less ferment concerning policies and objects as far as Negroes are concerned.

The largest Negro university in the United States is Howard at Washington. The board of trustees of Howard held a special meeting December 10. Representatives of the General Alumni Association appeared before them and demanded the dismissal of J. Stanley Durkee, the white president of the institution. The trustees refused to dismiss him and bore testimony "to our confidence in President Durkee's character and purpose." The charges against Dr. Durkee as voiced by the General Alumni Association fall under the following heads: First, almost total lack of social contact between the white president on the one hand and colored professors and colored students on the other. Second, the attempted dismissal or forced resignation of the leading colored professors including Kelly Miller, the best-known Howard alumnus; George William Cook, who has been with the institution fifty years; C. G. Woodson, a Harvard doctor of philosophy; T. W. Turner, a Cornell doctor of philosophy, and many others. Third, personal disrespect toward colored professors; calling one "a contemptible puppy," kicking another out of his office. Fourth, as the Howard Welfare League has written: "The spirit of education has departed from Howard. Visiting the institution today, the investigator discovers a system of espionage. This is operated to defend an administrative corps which, having no fixed policy, is subject to frequent attacks by the instructors disposed to preserve the traditions of education. The system is financed by personal preferment chiefly in the form of university patronage."

The board of trustees and the friends of the president declare that the alumni have not proved their allegations; of this the public is not in a position to judge. But certain it is that there is violent unrest at Howard and has been for the last five years. It culminated last year in a student strike and in a special meeting of the alumni during the summer at which the president was violently denounced.

Turning now from Howard, we find trouble at Lincoln in the southeastern part of Pennsylvania, an old Presbyterian school which has trained an unusually large number of colored men. Lincoln has never had a colored professor and never had a colored member on its board of trustees. For a long time it had no colored teachers. Then it began to appoint colored tutors and assistants and it even promised to allow representation of the alumni on the board of trustees. This has never taken place; and while the alumni from time to time have protested, they did not want to make trouble as long as the old regime of teachers stayed. When a new president was to be appointed the alumni insisted upon a voice. And then came the kind of thing which faces Negro education whenever it demands freedom. The white Presbyterians practically said: "We are furnishing the money for this school and we are going to run it as we see fit. It is none of your business whom we make president. If you don't like this kind of thing, support your own education." Not, of course, that they put the matter as bluntly as this but this is what they meant and it was this attitude which made the alumni hesitate. The trustees have nominated two successive candidates for the presidency. The first refused to accept when he heard of the opposition of the alumni. The second is considering the matter.

It is extraordinary that in schools like Howard and Lincoln it should be assumed that the parents of the students and the graduates of the school have no right to a voice in the policies of the school. Imagine such a stand at Harvard or at Yale! And does the fact that Harvard and Yale graduates are rich and able largely to support their colleges while Howard and Lincoln graduates are poor, create the wide difference in the attitude of the universities?

That the threat of withdrawal of support is no idle threat is shown by the situation at Atlanta University. Atlanta University has a distinguished past. It has had white teachers of eminence and learning. But because it was furthest down on the color-line frontier, it was compelled to take, from the beginning, a strong hand. It refused to close its doors to white students, it early gave the alumni representation on its board of trustees, it insisted upon social equality between the races within the walls of the institution. On the other hand, it held up high standards of scholarship, has always furnished a large proportion of the teachers in the higher public and private schools of the South, and was the first institution in this country to begin a scientific study of the Negro problem.

Despite this it has had a most difficult time in raising funds, and when recently Edward T. Ware, a young progressive Yale man, became president of the institution he was given to understand by philanthropic agencies in the North, such as the General Education Board, that if Atlanta University would surrender some of its radicalism and conform to their notions of what a Negro institution should be they would support it. But the institution has continued to have a free atmosphere and the voice of the alumni in its conduct has been influential. The result is today that Atlanta University is starving to death. Unless liberal Americans come to its rescue it cannot continue to do the work which it has done so well in the past. And it is this kind of fate that deters the insurgents at Howard and at Lincoln.

On the other hand, at Hampton the opposite policy has been pursued. Hampton has prided itself on its friendliness to the South. It has yielded in the past to practically every demand that the South has made, and while the demands of Virginia have not been as impossible to comply with as those of Georgia yet they have made Hampton decry the higher education of Negroes, admit colored men to the faculty with some reluctance, and carry out a system of racial segregation upon its own campus which brought annoying problems.

Despite all this and in curious contradiction Hampton has been compelled to establish a college department. The Hampton graduates, who have been in great demand in Southern public schools because the South has assumed they will be more tractable than others, were often unable under the old Hampton curriculum to pass the examinations. As a result Hampton has not only enriched her high school but established certain college courses and now offers a bachelor's degree. At the same time the demands upon her on the part of the Bourbon South have increased, and during the days when she and Tuskegee are trying to raise adequate endowment the "Anglo-Saxon" clubs of Virginia are demanding more complete racial segregation and separation on the Hampton campus. This cannot be granted without stirring up trouble with the students and alumni.

Most people hearing of these difficulties in colored institutions with white teachers immediately leap to the conclusion that the cure for all this is colored teachers and colored presidents. There are cases where the substitution of a colored president for a white president has brought happy results. But a colored president is no certain panacea. If we look at the matter carefully we will see that it is the character of the man and not the color of the skin that makes for success or lack of success. As a general thing, in colored colleges with colored presidents there is also unrest and protest because, for the most part, such presidents have not had the opportunity of broad education and contact and they are peculiarly cramped in their activities and growth either by the white philanthropists who are helping their institutions or the white churches that are supporting them or the white State officials under whom they work.

At Wilberforce, for instance, we have a church school dominated by the resident African Methodist bishop on the one hand and by State politics on the other. The bishop is a man of limited education and his idea of an institution of learning is quite as narrow as the idea of any bigoted white bishop. He has made his son president and the result is that through political manipulation and church domination Wilberforce has never become a real seat of liberal education. It is provincial, narrow, and vindictive, without discipline or ideal; and no man of broad learning and forward-looking plans is able to stay there long.

Nor is this situation confined to Wilberforce. A young colored graduate of one of our great Northern institutions went to teach economics at a Southern Negro school with Negro teachers. He stayed a little over a year and resigned. He writes:

You know the superstitions and orthodoxies by which even the so-called higher institutions among us are bound; and how skeptical administrators—white and black—view liberal thought among the faculty. A liberal on the faculty of the average Negro college usually succumbs to his orthodox environment or leaves the class in disgust. Were the liberal individual the only victim, the situation would not be worth such serious attention as some of us think necessary. The fact of the matter is that the cultural development of the Negro people is bound up inextricably with the life or death of liberalism in the various universities and colleges.

In Missouri an attempt was made to reorganize on broader lines Lincoln University, an institution founded by colored soldiers after the Civil War. A graduate of Atlanta University was made president and began the rebuilding. He had hardly started, however, when the politicians, colored and white, camped on his trail and but for the vote of the white State superintendent of education he would have been summarily dismissed this year without a hearing. The action of the State superintendent delayed the matter and black Missouri protested so vehemently that Nathan Young is still working at his difficult job.

Let us turn now from the Negro colleges to the white colleges. Throughout the South and, with one or two exceptions, in the border States, no Negro can be admitted to a white college. This means not separation; it means depriving Negroes of the best advantages of higher training. The State of Georgia, for instance, spends $655,135 for the higher training of its white youth and $10,000 for the higher training of its colored youth.

In Northern institutions for the most part Negroes are not denied admission. Princeton, while it shuffles and refuses to make a clear statement, has never admitted a Negro to its college department although it has had Negroes in the theological school. Yale has never encouraged their attendance. Harvard used to encourage them until their number began to grow. Vassar has graduated but one Negro student and did not know it at the time. Bryn Mawr and Barnard have tried desperately to exclude them. Radcliffe, Wellesley, and Smith have treated them with tolerance and even cordiality. Many small institutions or institutions with one or two Negro students have been gracious and kindly toward them, particularly in the Middle West. But on the whole, the attitude of the Northern institution toward the Negro student is one which varies from tolerance to active hostility.

In later years the tendency toward hostility has increased. This is because of the overcrowding of colleges, which has made them seek for pretexts to exclude prospective students, and because of the increase in the number of Negro applicants. In cases where colored students are received, effort is often made to segregate and insult them in various ways. They have been forced to establish their own fraternities, and even when their fraternities are established, are of national scope and of good standing certain universities, the University of Michigan for instance, refuse representation of colored fraternities on the Interfraternity Council.

Almost all Catholic institutions refuse to accept Negro students. There is not, I am told, a single colored candidate for the priesthood in a regular Catholic theological seminary and of the Catholic colleges only Fordham and Detroit admit Negroes.

In social affairs within white colleges discrimination has naturally been rife; for, first of all, what is a social affair? And what is social equality? Is it social equality for Negro and white students to sit in the same classrooms; or to eat in the college commons; or to room in the same dormitories; or to join the same clubs or fraternities; or to attend the class and college dances? Different institutions have drawn the line at different places. Williams has recently tried to force a colored boy out of its college dining-room. Harvard tried to keep colored boys out of its freshman dormitories. Michigan asked colored students to leave a university dance.

But it was left for Johns Hopkins to carry segregation to its furthest extent. Johns Hopkins gives extension courses and one of the courses was chosen by the teachers of Wilmington, Delaware. Among these teachers were twenty-four colored teachers. Immediately they were notified by the authorities of Johns Hopkins that these colored teachers could not be admitted to the extension courses. All of the teachers, both colored and white, thereupon refused to take the course!

The whole problem resolves itself to this fundamental question: Do we want Negroes educated according to their ability and with the aim of making them independent, self-directing, modern men or are we determined still to educate them as a subordinate caste? Upon the way in which we answer this question depends our interpretation of the problems presented above.

The Menace of Mussolini and Horthy

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, February 9

WE have just had Mussolini's violent attack on Germany, unprecedented in its insolence and vulgarity in the speeches of men occupying such a position as his. It has been received with enthusiastic approval by the Temps and the French Nationalist press generally, although France has been just as violently attacked in Italy by the Fascist press and Italian ambitions are a much greater menace to France than any alleged German designs. Were the military situation of Germany still the same as in 1914 I think that Mussolini would have chosen his language more carefully, but it is easy to threaten an unarmed country. The bombast of the speech and its preposterous misrepresentation of the history of German South Tyrol and of the present Italian policy in that unhappy territory should not make us forget the open menace of war with which it ended. This man is bound to make war sooner or later, just as surely as Napoleon III was. War is the logical outcome of such a regime as that at present existing in Italy. Of the many existing dangers to peace in Europe Fascism is the greatest. One would conclude from the articles in the Italian papers that Italy contemplates war on France with the object of territorial expansion. That seems hardly probable, but one never knows into what act of madness men may be led when they are suffering from swelled head as badly as the Italian Fascists. It was an act of madness on the part of Napoleon III to declare war on Prussia, but he did it.

It is, however, more likely that Mussolini will prefer to attack a less formidable enemy. It is plain from his speech and from other Fascist utterances that the Italian Fascists have further designs on Austrian territory. Logically they are almost bound sooner or later to demand North Tyrol, for North and South Tyrol have been one for nearly fourteen centuries and the Brenner frontier is an ethnological absurdity as well as a crime. They have long had designs on Dalmatia, and documents which came into the hands of the Yugoslavian Government two or three months ago showed that those designs have taken very definite shape. The Italian Fascists have also colonial ambitions and aggressive aims in the Near East. They would like nothing better than a war between England and Turkey, in which they could intervene on the side of England—for a consideration. Perhaps part of the consideration has already been paid by England in the shape of the extraordinarily lenient terms of the Italian debt settlement. Mr. Churchill, however, who dreams of becoming the English Mussolini, would naturally be inclined to give specially favorable terms to a Fascist government. The present British Government is a bad one from the international point of view. It hardly makes for peace to make concessions to the most aggressive and bellicose Government in Europe which, on the eve of a disarmament conference (which can be nothing but a ghastly joke), is spending every penny that it can afford or cannot afford on increasing the strength of its army and navy. By the way, the American loan to Italy has come in handy for that purpose.

The British Government is also doing its best to save the Horthy-Bethlen gang in Hungary from an international inquiry into their misdeeds. But for English opposition, France would already have broken off diplomatic relations with Hungary in order to bring the scandal of the forged French bank-notes before the League of Nations. And France is quite right in this case. There is no longer the slightest doubt that the Hungarian Government has, if not connived at, at least tolerated, with full knowledge of the facts, the forgeries of foreign bank-notes that have been going on in Hungary for the last five or six years. And what we should know is the political plot that lies behind the forgeries, for undoubtedly there is one.

It may not be amiss to summarize the main facts about the Hungarian forgeries, as the inquiry has revealed them. They seem to have begun about 1920, for the first forged Czecho-Slovakian notes were discovered in that year. From the first Nadossy, the Chief of the Hungarian Police, has been one of the ringleaders of the gang of aristocratic forgers. It was he who protected Joseph Pazurik and Meszaros when they were arrested in connection with the Czecho-Slovakian forgeries and who succeeded in stifling the whole affair. Pazurik had had a checkered career. He was an Austrian spy during the war and then appeared in Budapest during the Communist regime as an ardent supporter of Bela Kun, who gave him some official post. After Bela Kun's fall, Pazurik went to Budapest and, by posing as a patriotic Slovak (though a Magyar, he was born in Slovakia), obtained from the Czecho-Slovakian Government, which knew nothing about his past, a post in the passport office of the Czecho-Slovakian legation in Budapest. He was dismissed when it was discovered that he had supplied the Hungarian Government with the names of victims of the White Terror, who had been given Czecho-Slovakian visas to save their lives by escaping from Hungary, and had got them shot at the frontier. He then took to forgery as a stepping-stone to a career in the Hungarian civil service. For, after the discovery of the Czecho-Slovakian forgeries, both he and Meszaros were rewarded by the Hungarian Government. Pazurik became a high permanent official of the Ministry of the Interior, and Meszaros was made a professor in Budapest University.

Knowing all about Nadossy's connection with the Czecho-Slovakian forgeries, Count Bethlen allowed him to remain Chief of the Hungarian Police until a few weeks ago. Naturally, Nadossy has continued his operations and counted on continuing them with impunity. Pazurik seems to have continued to help him, for the former disappeared from Budapest immediately after the arrests of the Awakening Magyars in Holland. Prince Windisch-Graetz seems to have joined the gang about two years ago.

Count Bethlen has now admitted that he knew about the French forgeries on November 27, when he addressed the letter to Count Perenyi, president of the National Association (the leading Hungarian Fascist organization), which has now been published. He went off to Geneva to attend the Council of the League of Nations without taking steps to stop the forgeries or discover their authors. In the middle of December the three men were arrested in Holland. After the Hungarian Minister at the Hague had vainly tried to obtain their release, the Hungarian Foreign Office telegraphed several times to the Dutch Government, completely covering the arrested men and asking for their release, which was not, of course, granted. The day after the arrests Nadossy himself admitted to Count Bethlen his own share in the matter. Count Bethlen allowed him to remain in office for a fortnight after that admission and to conduct the inquiry into the forgeries! It is only because the French Government insisted on his arrest that Nadossy is not still in office at this moment. Indeed, but for the fact that the Hungarian Government was forced to allow the French police to take part in the investigations, the whole affair would have been hushed up, as was that of the Czecho-Slovakian notes. M. Clinchant, the French Minister at Budapest, had almost to threaten a rupture of diplomatic relations before he could get Bethlen to do anything at all. It may be that Bethlen lacked the power rather than the will to act. Nadossy was more powerful than he. Behind the façade of the nominal Government was the occult Fascist Government, of which Nadossy was the chief. His position was much more important than that of a mere chief of police and resembled that of the minister of police under Napoleon, except that Nadossy had even more power than a Fouché, for Fouché had to deal with the great Napoleon and Nadossy had to deal only with Admiral Horthy.

What were the political aims behind the forgeries? Partly, no doubt, the mad enterprise of further depreciating the French franc by throwing forged notes on the market, partly the desire to get money for the Fascist operations. There is strong reason to believe that a Fascist coup d'état in Hungary was planned and that the idea was to put the Archduke Albrecht on the Hungarian throne. He was the honorary president of the National Association, but resigned after the revelation of the scandal. It is, however, a very probable hypothesis that the aims of the conspirators went beyond Hungary. Mussolini had certainly been consulted. Ulain, the Hungarian Fascist leader, visited him in Rome and the Archduke Albrecht also went to Rome and was received by Cardinal Gasparri, papal Secretary of State. The Hungarian Fascists seem to have been convinced that they would have Mussolini's support in the event of their coup succeeding and that Italy would threaten Czecho-Slovakia and Jugoslavia if those countries tried to intervene. It is also probable that one of the aims of the plot was the overthrow of the Austrian republic.

An inquiry by the League of Nations is necessary to clear the matter up. Naturally Italy is opposed to any such inquiry and it may be on that account that the British Government is also opposed to it. An inquiry, if it were genuine and thorough, might lead to revelations unpleasant to Mr. Churchill's Fascist friends. The Hungarian Government is doing its utmost to prevent investigation of the political aspects of the affair. Although the parliamentary committee was appointed expressly to investigate those aspects the government majority on the committee decided not to investigate them. Hungary is one of the plague spots of Europe and the present Hungarian regime is an abomination. It was never intended to be permanent, but England and France, for reasons that have never been explained and are probably not fit for publication, have never insisted on the fulfilment of the undertaking given by Horthy, that a plebiscite should be held to decide the permanent form of government.

If the Hungarian abscess is not pricked; if the present regime is allowed to continue, and ends, as it is almost sure to end, in a Hapsburg restoration by force, Czecho-Slovakia and Jugoslavia will not be restrained any longer. And, if they walked into Hungary, who can foretell what the consequences would be? It must not be forgotten that Hungary was admitted into the League of Nations only on an undertaking that there should be no restoration of the Hapsburgs. If they have tolerated a plot for their restoration, Horthy and Bethlen have violated that undertaking. The League of Nations has the right to inquire whether they have or not.

In the Driftway

THAT disorderly frump, Mother Nature, must have stared in amazement—and then chuckled—on the day she produced the Efficiency Expert. Ever since he has gone his humorless, brisk way, putting the world in order. His latest victim is the calendar. For the calendar is all wrong. Its months are of uneven length; there is no telling on what day of the week a date will fall; and the last four months of the year are numbered from seven to ten instead of from nine to twelve. The only thing one can do with a calendar like that is change it, for it doesn't fit into any logical scheme of living.

* * * * *

JULIUS CAESAR is partly responsible for this state of affairs. When he arranged our calendar a couple of thousand years ago, vanity and family pride interfered with his efficiency and gave us July and August and a ninth month named September—but no solution for the real difficulty; the real difficulty lies deeper. In fact, it is the Universe itself which falls so sadly short of the expert's ideal of order. "Surely," one imagines him muttering to himself, "it must have been a slipshod Workman who neglected to make the lunar and the solar years match." Having complained thus he proceeds to correct, in so far as he is able, the grave mistake made some millions of years ago when God was young and careless. He proposes to divide the year into thirteen months of four weeks each and rename them. That would wipe out Caesar's bungling. Then he would gather the discrepancy between the solar and lunar years into an occasional homeless week between the years.

* * * * *

BUT the Drifter is thankful for the carelessness of God and the vanity of Caesar. He sincerely hopes that this plan does not succeed. It would put an end forever to that delightful experience of five pay-days in a month. And even the bizarre effect of that nameless week could not possibly take the place of the present refreshing disorder in the length of the months. Worst of all, the first of the month and of the year would always fall on the same day of the week, probably Monday. The Drifter is overcome with weariness at the mere thought of such a monotony of Mondays to the end of time. How could art or conversation or any joy persist in such a world? It is irregularity that makes life interesting. But the Drifter is not really alarmed over the situation. He feels quite sure that the superstition concerning the number thirteen will effectively balk the plan. He himself is not superstitious about the number thirteen—he has passed on to more subtle superstitions—but the fact that few liners, even in this enlightened age, have staterooms numbered thirteen encourages him to believe that the Efficiency Expert will find it hard to make man live by a thirteen-month calendar.

The Trusts and the Tariff

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On what grounds can free traders or protectionists explain the hullabaloo which many of them are raising over neglect to enforce the anti-trust act? Free traders know that trusts exist as a natural product of special privilege, including the tariff. They know that the anti-trust law is but a trick devised by dishonest and ignorant protectionists to divert attention from the tariff iniquity. When they demand enforcement of the anti-trust act they are not only helping the dishonest protectionist game but are in the position of knowingly prescribing a quack remedy for a serious disease.

As to protectionists, they claim to believe in the theory that the way to keep wages high is to help manufacturers to make big profits. On that ground they advocate the protective tariff. They further know (for some of the most ardent protectionists have cited the fact) that big profits in an industry encourage investment of capital therein, with the result that increased competition lowers profits. And it may be added, must decrease wages—if the protectionist hypothesis is correct. To prevent this trusts and combinations are formed so that any effort to compel dissolution must necessarily neutralize the so-called benefits of protection. When Mr. Coolidge, or his Attorney General, claims to favor enforcement of the anti-trust act he must either realize the fallacy or fraud of the protectionist position, or that anti-trust suits, while they may cause some trouble, can do no real harm to protected monopolies.

An anti-trust suit when directed against a real monopoly, not some little unprivileged scapegoat, is on its face but an effort to prevent by one law what a stronger law encourages. Moreover, it is an effort to use methods which have failed to check even petty larceny—a practice which has no large gains to offer—to do away with practices which may bring to the one indulging therein the fortune of a Gary or Mellon.

If we insist on maintaining special privilege it is but waste of effort to endeavor to enforce the anti-trust law. And the more earnest and sincere the enforcer the greater the waste and harm. There is no method "just as good" as complete and speedy abolition of all special privileges. Free traders should insist on that fact. Six months of absolute free trade will cure more than thirty-six years of Sherman acts.

Marriage a Financial Partnership

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A group of influential college women in Wisconsin recently discussed a legal paper on Marriage a Financial Partnership, which proposed the following law:

1. The sum of the net income of the husband and the net income of the wife shall be the joint income and both shall have an equal voice in the spending or disposal of the joint income.

2. In case of violation of the above provision either husband or wife may appeal to the judge of the circuit court (or court of domestic relations). The hearing shall be a private one. The court may require a budget to be filed for the year, signed by both husband and wife, allotting the income into the usual schedules for family budgets, including pocket money for both husband and wife. Failure to observe the budget as filed, to a reasonable degree, by either husband or wife shall be cause for a decree of divorce from bed and board.

The advantages of this law over the voluntary contract proposed by Doris Stevens are, of course, that it would give a legal recognition to the wife as a partner, thus maintaining her self-respect; and it would furnish a legal remedy in all cases of marital unhappiness including those in which no contract has been made.

A judge of the Court of Domestic Relations in New York has recently been quoted as saying:

More than half the divorce cases that come before me arise out of disputes concerning money in the home and are occasioned either by the extravagance of the wife or the penuriousness of the husband. Almost all such cases could have been avoided by the simple expedient of a home budget, made out in agreement by the two heads of the household and administered by the wife.

The proposed law would give to the husband of an extravagant wife a more workable remedy than the present clumsy, public refusal to pay the debts contracted by her. Suits are now commonly brought by merchants, for goods contracted for by the wife, under the rule of the old common law that a wife is entitled to the "necessaries" of life. (It was held in Massachusetts that she was entitled "to the necessities suitable to the condition of a pauper and no more.") This rule has been modified to the extent of a Minnesota decision which speaks of the well-known fact that in modern society the wife as the manager of the household is clothed with authority to pledge his credit for articles of ordinary household use. But when articles purchased do not fall fairly in the domestic department or are not properly necessities but are excessive in amount or extravagant in their nature the presumption of authority from cohabitation does not arise. The term necessities, in its legal sense, as applied to a wife is not confined to articles of food and clothing required to sustain life or preserve decency but includes such articles of utility or even ornament as are suitable to maintain the wife according to the estate and rank of her husband.

This suitability is a question of fact for a jury, with all its nauseous publicity. Under the proposed law the husband could bring his wife to reason privately, with the aid of the judge—and the penurious husband could be likewise given a chance to reform.

Under the civil-law rule of community of property, which exists in many of our Western States, a wife has a certain recognition as a partner in ownership, though not in management, and a decision in the State of Washington says:

The conjugal partnership, though agreeing in some, differs in many essential particulars from the conventional. The former has higher and more important purposes, essential, in fact, to the welfare and even the existence of society.

There is now a Uniform Partnership Act, adopted by many States, which might be applied to the marriage partnership.

Sweden and Denmark have adopted a marriage law which establishes in principle the equality of both parties in a marriage and which expressly states that the personal work in the home, which is generally performed by the wife, shall be a contribution to the common support, and that the party which has no money, generally the wife, has a legal right to receive for his or her own disposal whatever funds may be necessary for general household expenses and personal needs according to current customs.

The most radical effect of the law proposed above would be giving husband and wife equal voice in the investment or other disposal of the savings above living expenses—how much should go back into business, into savings, into what investments. In some cases a wife's business judgment on these points might be disastrous. Often, however, she would counsel against unwise investments. Where a woman lacks business training this plan would give her experience and guidance by the husband, which might prove exceedingly valuable. In case of inability to agree, the court could always be appealed to as an arbitrator, or, if worst came to worst, the partnership could be dissolved by divorce, as happens so frequently already.

Labor Capitalism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is unfortunate that Mr. Cedric Long may give the impression that Standard Oil, Kresge's, and Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company are examples of labor capitalism, in his article Labor Capitalism—Where Does It Lead? (February 10). Such an impression is created by a citation of the colossal profits of these profiteering institutions, with no mention of the nominal profits of the purely labor types of modern business, i.e., labor banks and labor insurance companies. The banks of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers are limited by their by-laws to 10 per cent dividends. Other labor institutions, either purely or quasi-cooperative, have like provisions.

No one can object to Mr. Long's censure of the present drift of American labor into business, but one has a right to hope that Mr. Long will not contribute to the present darkness by failing to define terms and make important distinctions.

Certain sections of American labor are now bitterly fighting employer-stock-sharing schemes and employee-and-customer-ownership schemes, which Mr. Long seems to think are forms of labor capitalism. I am familiar with purely cooperative enterprises which have the approval of Mr. Long, and I cannot see that they differ in any particular from the cooperative enterprises which he chooses to call examples of labor capitalism.

Strictly speaking there is no such thing as labor capitalism. Capitalism has but one aim—the making of profits. Laborism has but one aim—the protection of human beings in industry. These aims are mutually exclusive.

Russia's War Guilt

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Referring to your article Russia's War Guilt Becomes Plainer in the January 27 issue of The Nation, I wonder whether you observed that I myself cited Von Schilling's "Diary" in my editing of the Russian Ministerial Council Journal? That I drew no conclusions from the Journal with reference to Russian mobilization was not because the document had no bearing on Russian mobilization, but simply because it told us no more on that point than we knew already. The one new thing that we could not have accepted from the Von Schilling "Diary," but which can be based on the Journal, is a fact relating to diplomacy, not to military affairs. No reliable historian could have based on the Von Schilling "Diary" alone the conclusion that a certain plan of procedure was the only diplomatic plan for meeting the Serbian crisis which was ever sanctioned by the full authority of the Russian Government.

There is so much difficulty in any case in avoiding the confusion of issues when the question of war origin is discussed that polemic writing in almost any direction is likely to lead away from the truth. They were all of them guilty enough! But the specific point which you make—that Russian guilt is made plainer than it was before by the document which I published—seems ill founded.

ROBERT C. BINKLEY,
Reference Librarian

Stanford University, California, February 5

[In our editorial of January 27 we stated at length the reasons why the minutes of the Russian ministerial council of July 24, 1914, help to make the case against Russia still more definite. The only point of importance in the full minutes which is not mentioned in the "Diary" relates to the calling in of the Russian money in Germany and Austria, something which indicates a strong Russian anticipation of immediate war at a time when the military and diplomatic situation was not at all menacing. In the light of subsequent developments in Russia and France it is now apparent that the Russian diplomatic suggestions to Serbia on the 24th were in no sense made in good faith, but were the initial stage in the diplomatic barrage under cover of which military activities were consciously and designedly launched which made any diplomatic settlement of the crisis out of question.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Goats

By CHARLES ERSKINE SCOTT WOOD

What I liked best in Sicily
Was not cloud-making Aetna, nor the fanes
Of old Greek gods, silent in majesty
Of death, but the early fresh-milk trains
That come while borage leaves hold dew
And the starry flowers of lapis blue
Are wet with Night; herds of whimsical
Black, brown, and spotted grave she-goats,
With stare indifferent and quizzical;
Furry tassels dangling at their throats.
Nonchalantly sauntering to town,
They bite the wayside weed
With dainty, lip-selecting greed,
Skipping lightly to a wall,
Or even a house top, looking down
To mock with wag of beard the herder's call.
Through the narrow streets they pass from door to door
And full of sympathy for motherhood
Fill frothing bowls for babies of the poor,
From bulging udders, soft and round and good.
By the dripping fountain of the public square
Women wait for them, chatting the while
They squirt white jets through bottle-necks; a stair
Of stone one climbs to feed the sick; looking back to smile
A sly satiric grin of goatly guile.
Then all lie down to rest in a shadow place
Against a wall, chewing their sidewise cud
Till presently, with pretty mincing pace
They seek the mountain and the tumbling flood.

First Glance

THE history of mankind is among other things the history of those reputations which mankind has chosen to keep alive. We are familiar with books recording the growth and decay of legends built round the careers of persons who were interesting for their conduct—Socrates, Alexander, Caesar, Jesus, Charlemagne, Washington, Lincoln. We are not so familiar with researches made by scholars into the reputations of great authors. The materials for such researches vary, of course, in direct proportion to the length of time the authors have been dead; and it is natural that the earliest studies should have dealt with names like Homer and Virgil—the stories of these names throwing light in the first instance upon democratic sentiment in eighteenth-century Germany and in the second instance upon Italian superstition in the Middle Ages. As time has gone on, however, a richer field has been left exposed, so that Mr. Paget Toynbee, by following the vicissitudes of Dante's vogue in England, could write in effect a history of English taste. And more recently still the thing has been done by English scholars for English authors themselves. The reputation of Shakespeare, which would tell much, has still to be written; but that of Milton for more than a century after his death has been treated with illuminating thoroughness by an American student, Mr. R. D. Havens, and I remember that not the least interesting portion of Professor Cross's "History of Henry Fielding" was perhaps the portion analyzing the successive opinions entertained of Fielding by critics and biographers.

Easily the masterpiece in this mode is Caroline F. E. Spurgeon's "Five Hundred Years of Chaucer Criticism and Allusion: 1357-1900" (Macmillan: 3 vols.: $16.50), now made available for a larger public than the Chaucer Society for which it was compiled and by which it was published. Only those, perhaps, who have attempted similar researches will appreciate the labor and the skill with which Miss Spurgeon has applied herself to hers; but I am persuaded that anyone who opens the ample volumes, perceives their plan, dips here and there into the stream of commentary which runs from Lydgate to Skeat, examines the numerous facsimiles of manuscript pages, and happens at last upon the pictures of the Canterbury pilgrims by Stothard and Blake will be fascinated. And whoever turns back to Miss Spurgeon's introduction, in which she not only furnishes a key to the endless extracts which follow but suggests how upon them a history of critical taste and method might be based, will be made aware at once of the importance of all such studies. Miss Spurgeon is a little careless, I think, in her use of the word "evolution" to describe what may have been merely chances and changes in the career of Chaucer's fame—this, too, in spite of her advice to modern readers not "to feel that the way we regard an author . . . is the truest and only possible way he can be regarded." The first and last fact about Chaucer is that always, except to a degree between 1602 and 1687, he has been read; and the shifting reasons for this, while they are extremely interesting, do not necessarily indicate an evolution. But the story is told on the whole so well that Caxton, Thynne, Beaumont, Dryden, Tyrwhitt, Furnivall, and Skeat become heroic figures; and that is an achievement.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Glory Called Life

More Changes, More Chances. By Henry W. Nevinson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

"THE glory called life" and "the still, sad music of humanity"—in these clashing phrases, taken from the closing paragraphs of his book, we have the authentic interpretation of the man called Nevinson and of all his works. "In spite of all that man has done to strip the earth of her wild beauty," life is still to him "the vision splendid." His hope that he may live to write of the last twelve years of war and reconstruction will be passionately echoed by all who have the good fortune to follow the changes and chances that he has so enchantingly related.

With this, the second volume of the story of his active life, he carries the record down through the crowded decade from the close of the Boer War to the baleful dawn of the World War. The three mortal years of servitude on the Daily Chronicle, where his voice of reason was smothered by the unbending war policy of the paper, were at last over and he was once more free—free to go to Macedonia, which was then, in October, 1903, undergoing its customary "pacification" at the hands of the Turks.

It might seem that the spirit which ever denies had a controlling hand in shaping the career of this shy, self-distrustful, tolerant Englishman who hated war as he hated the devil. The former volume, "Changes and Chances," bristles with such titles as The Thirty Days' War (Greece-Turkey in 1897), The Spanish-American War, and Ladysmith and Pretoria, while the present work carries him from the Macedonian massacres to the abortive Russian revolution of 1905, to India during the "unrest" of 1907, to Spain's unending, intermittent war against the Moors of the Riff in 1909, to Ulster for Carson's incipient rebellion, through the Balkan wars of 1912-1913, and finally to the seething streets of Berlin on the eve of the World War. But it isn't necessary to resort to a thaumaturgic explanation of this inconsistency. The spirit that denies is within us. It frustrates one desire to gratify another and stronger impulse. The dominating passion in Nevins was not, as he sometimes believed, to live out his years in contemplation, like the Hindu mystic whom he envied in Madras, nor, abandoning the life of chances and changes, to throw in his lot definitely with the men of letters. This temptation he resisted when he found himself wondering "if it were not possible to add the sharp reality of strong and active experience to the imaginative powers so carefully cultivated in the cloisters of literary seclusion." Xenophon was his ideal of life (though he was really far more like the much-wandering Ulysses), but it was the Xenophon who "stood among the soldiers whom he had succeeded in guiding through the center of unknown Asia and heard their exultant cry at sight of the sea." No, he could not rest from travel. He must drink life to the lees.

In trying to understand that crowded life of high adventure, admiring but misguided friends have described Nevins as a knight-errant. But he has never found it necessary to look for trouble. Trouble has never had the slightest difficulty in finding him nor he in recognizing it and making it his own. His motto might have been like that of a boys' club in Chicago: "As long as there's a boy in trouble, we are in trouble."

And so it was that, when in 1904 the Harpers offered to finance him for an "adventurous journey," he selected the Portuguese slave territories of Angola, West Central Africa, and the two cocoa islands of San Thome and Principe as the scene of his exploit. This, which Nevins characterizes as the main enterprise of his life, was, as he confesses, of all his activities the one that was nearest his heart. The story of his incredible journeys through the fever-infested swamps and forests of the mainland, of his dealings with the simple-minded natives and of the shocking cruelties of the slave-system as practiced by the traders and on the plantations, is told with simplicity and with graphic power. Stricken with fever and often in danger of his life, not from the natives but from the European planters and traders, he completed his work and managed to make his escape, returning to England after an absence of about eight months. He came back not as a conquering hero but as a sensation-monger to meet the chilly indifference of the general public and the active hostility of the Quaker cocoa concerns and their influential friends and newspapers and even of the Foreign Office. But he kept up the fight through writings and public addresses until public opinion and the government came to his support. The battle is not yet won; slavery and the slave trade still flourish in the Portuguese possessions; but its evils have in some respects been mitigated and the system is on its slow, reluctant way to extinction.

Once more the happy warrior buckled on his armor when in the course of the suffrage movement "women whom I knew—women whom everyone respected—like Cobden's daughter and Mrs. Lawrence, took to rioting and were sent to prison" and had foul outrages perpetrated on them by the police and by prison officials. How he must have hated it all—the disgraceful street scenes, the ridicule and obloquy—and yet how intrepidly he carried on until the victory was won! Here again we have the old conflict, the fastidious, hypersensitive nature, "averse," he says "from all contention," swept on by the passion for justice and decency. How deeply the iron entered into his soul may be gathered from the statement written six years later: "I account two days in my life as especially happy—one was that February 6, 1918," when the suffrage bill received the royal assent; "the other, December 6, 1921, when I heard in Washington that the treaty between my country and Southern Ireland had been signed. But of the two the happiness of the former day was the greater, the relief and joy being almost incredible."

Despite his inveterate shyness such a man would make friends, for friendship is an art and the winning of a friend a high adventure. He found them under many skies—Tolstoi in Russia, the saintly Madhu Sudan Das and the invincible Surendra Nath, "the gray-bearded son of thunder," in India, Thomas Hardy and George Meredith in his own England—and by the subtle alchemy of understanding made them his own. Most of all, however, he was at home in the Fleet Street he loved and among the great journalists with whom he worked, and the greatest of these was the master, Massingham. Of all of these and of many more he has written engagingly, with rare comprehension and discrimination, giving us incomparable portraits of all the great figures that made and marred the time in which his life was cast.

Much has been said and well said of Mr. Nevins's literary craftsmanship, but there is art as well as craftsmanship in this picture of an era. We see, as in a vision, the whole process of our world rattling into barbarism, but at the same time we see it throwing up isles of safety for the generations to come, making spiritual gains to confirm our ancient faith in the capacity of our dull humanity to muddle through to a more secure footing on our slippery planet. This record, when completed by the third instalment of changes and chances, will furnish to all who come after us the one indispensable interpretation of the period closed by the World War.

GEORGE W. KIRCHWEY

The War Upon the Unseen

Microbe Hunters. By Paul de Kruif. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

IN this book, for the first time, the war upon pathogenic organisms comes out of the laboratory and takes on all the sweaty, vociferous gusto of a bout between longshoremen. I hope I am not misunderstood. Dr. de Kruif doesn't vulgarize it in the slightest. But he dramatizes it superbly; he converts its heroes from the cold, impersonal scientists of legend into brilliantly real and human men, full of the weaknesses that are in all the rest of us, and separated from the general only by the touch of genius. How does Robert Koch look to the world? It sees, I believe, only a beard, a pair of spectacles, and a microscope; the man might be one of his own tubercles. But in Dr. de Kruif's gaudy pages he begins to live and breathe; nay, to kick and yell. He is not only the discoverer of the tubercle bacillus but also the German patriot, and eager to floor Pasteur. He is not only a man of abysmal learning but also a man of gorgeous romance, with the dreams of a schoolboy and the high adventures of a movie actor.

I confess that this rescue of Koch delights me, for he is the only absolute genius I have ever had the pleasure of meeting in this world, and that encounter left me full of suspicions that the real Koch was far from the Koch of common rumor. We crossed the ocean together, and when the ship-news reporters came aboard in New York harbor I heard him tell them one of the boldest lies ever heard by these ears. It was so bold, indeed, that it betrayed me into violating the principles of a lifetime, and I gave him away. But mere lying, of course, is not enough to make me marvel; I have known three Presidents of the United States. What fetched me was the astounding contrast between the old Geheimerat and his wife. He was nearly seventy, perhaps five feet six inches in height, and so frail that he rattled in his tourist tweeds like King George in his ermine. His wife loomed above him like the Jungfrau above the Interlaken town-pump. She was perhaps twenty-five, and in the full flush of what passes for beauty among the designers of Munich post cards. Her hair was a blinding gold; her sharpest angle was a lovely epicycloid; she weighed a good thirteen stone; she had been a star in drama with music. Both had been horribly seasick all the way from Cherbourg to Sandy Hook, lying supine in their deck-chairs like a yellow taxicab wrecked alongside a Corona. Yet the father of modern bacteriology stood up to the reporters, and told them that he had not missed a meal.

Such scandals, of course, concern de Kruif only incidentally, though he by no means evades them. The fact that Spallanzani was accused of looting his own laboratory of specimens seems interesting to him, as in fact it is, and he sets it down. Pasteur's shocking disregard for scientific facts, Metchnikoff's grotesque and wearisome attempts to commit suicide, Leeuwenhoek's squirrel-like hoarding of microscopes, Ross's banal poetizing—all these things go into his chronicle. He not only records them; he obviously enjoys them. But his main business is to describe the work of these men, not their foibles, and to that business he brings an extraordinary combination of sound knowledge and dramatic sense. A bacteriologist himself, he knows precisely what they were trying to do, and understands thoroughly the difficulties that confronted them. How they surmounted those difficulties one by one, partly by ingenuity and pertinacity and partly by dumb luck—this is the substance of his story. It is one of the most exciting stories in all the annals of mankind. No great captain in history, whether of armies or of industry, ever accomplished the half that Koch accomplished. His work was equal to a hundred Waterloos and a hundred steel trusts. Lincoln's job, compared to his, was easy. He brought into the world a whole series of new concepts, and all of them (save perhaps one) were sound. And he did all that with no tools save such as were available to any country doctor, and no encouragement save that of his somewhat bewildered wife—his first one, not the coryphee aforesaid.

The book of de Kruif is immensely interesting. The author does not disdain the arts of the rhetorician. He is not afraid of dramatic pauses and exclamation points. But his story is by no means a mere dramatization. There is a great deal of hard work behind it, a laborious inquiry into matters regarding which even most bacteriologists know little. It is an exhilarating and valuable contribution to one of the noblest chapters in the history of mankind.

H. L. MENCKEN

Twilight of the Demigods

Mr. Fortune's Trials. By H. C. Bailey. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

The Amaranth Club. By J. S. Fletcher. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

EXCEPT for enchanting apparitions like Mr. Bailey's Dr. Fortune and Mr. Chesterton's Father Brown all detectives seem to have left the uplands of godhead and fallen plump into waste barrens of realism. More and more authors are trying to make their gumshoe behaviorists act like gumshoe men in hotel corridors and private agencies, and as a consequence they are all as thrilling as plain-clothes men in "real" life. The twilight of the gods began with the second and third comings of Sherlock Holmes and the pedestrian detectives of J. S. Fletcher and the sleuths who have got into the bad habit of marrying heroines and settling down to the gumshoe business. Falstaff has given up his divine prose rhythms and talks like an old soak in a corner bar; and the latest children of Sherlock Holmes use methods approved by the commissioner of police.

It all began in the right method of great art with Messrs. Dupin and Lecoq. Of course M. Dupin may talk too well and M. Lecoq may have a wardrobe of disguises which would burden the most versatile character actor. Sherlock Holmes is a spectator of human errors and Father Brown is the victim of a metaphysical idea and Dr. Fortune goes out in the best society. They are all demigods like Medea and Hagen and Othello, who never spout cascades of dulness like people in real life, but administer a legend peopled with demons and witches and a shining intelligence. They play the game for the love of the game and run down masters of crime as a knight takes a rook. The whole business is not a business but a maze like chess played according to a series of complicated moves and beautiful like the web of a tone poem. In a word, they are all artists, and not cops; and they care only for a crime unraveled like a problem in which the crook has to be captured in just three advances of the pawn supported by the knight and the bishop.

One welcomes Dr. Fortune as a return to the great tradition. He has wit and charm like M. Lecoq and is unique like Sherlock Holmes, who is the natural child of M. Lecoq. Perhaps in these degenerate days J. S. Fletcher's commonplace young men will be the favorites of the middle class, which just now wants "real" life and a love interest trundled into a game of high art like a perambulator substituted for the flying steed of the valkyries or a red queen in chess taken with the fine portly figure of the white bishop. Right now it is an age of proved realism; and yet Dr. Fortune may claim kinship with the immortals rather than with the grocers who weigh prunes on Main Street. His only error is that he does not go in for disguises and that he patronizes horticulture instead of injecting his arm with cocaine. He may outgrow these faults; and yet it is hard to complain about him when he is the only living detective except Father Brown who would feel at home with M. Dupin and M. Lecoq and the great Sherlock Holmes. It is not so much that he tracks down the murderer by one careless foot-print on the sandbag or that his methods of detection are more ingenious than Mr. Austin Freeman's Dr. Thorndike, who has science without personal distinction. It is only that he plays his gambits like the gambits of a work of art.

There would be no use in just anyone setting out to create a great detective, for as in the case of music and literature it always takes a first-rate mind to create a first-rate work of art. Every week whole bushels of detectives are loaded on trucks and dumped down like sacks on the heads of the public. All of them try, Oh, so hard, for some individual something marking them off from the herd. One parts his hair in the middle and the other is a professor out of a job and a third is a secret-service gent who claps a handcuff on the yellow hand of the Japanese peril. All, all are born out of an unnatural wedlock of Sherlock Holmes and M. Lecoq, and none except Dr. Fortune and Father Brown exist by their own right of substance. Were it not for these fascinating amateurs of crime one might despair of the age. Where even has there been another like Mr. Bronson-Howard's Yorke Norroy with a wardrobe as intricate as M. Lecoq's own and a disarming manner almost as capturing as Sherlock Holmes's refined accents? Where except for Mr. Bailey and Mr. Chesterton is the new genius who shall wipe the mire of realism from the gumshoes of his detectives and put them back in the company gathered in the halls of the elect?

DONALD DOUGLAS

Russian History

An Economic History of Russia. By James Mavor. Second edition. E. P. Dutton and Company. $12.

A History of Russia. By S. F. Platonov. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THE appearance of a new edition of the late Professor Mavor's monumental work is an event to be hailed with delight. These two stout volumes, packed with an abundance of factual material relating to the economic history of Russia, have long been an indispensable item in the library of every student of the subject. The new edition, however, does not fulfil the hopes roused by its publishers' announcement. One searches in vain for the additional chapter; a brief paragraph appended to the epilogue is all that rewards the utmost diligence. And while one may heartily agree with Kropotkin's criticism of Kluchevski—which seems to constitute the publishers' notion of a new introduction—Professor Mavor was himself so conscious of the extraordinary merit of Kluchevski's work that he has left Book I of the "Economic History" intact. This historical introduction remains a mere synopsis of the lectures by the late Professor Kluchevski which were first printed in 1883-1884 and of which the existing English translation is but a mutilation. The new edition is, properly speaking, neither revised nor enlarged; yet as a reprint of an extremely valuable work it was well worth doing.

Professor Platonov is specially recommended by his American editor as one who was devoid of "the preconceived ideas about Russian history prevailing in his day." Unfortunately the opening sentence of the English text belies this belief. That "the Russian state traces its beginnings to the ninth century A.D." is the fundamental concept of the Russian historians of forty years ago; it is precisely the ground on which Prince Kropotkin criticized Kluchevski. Professor Platonov, as a pupil of the latter, absorbed his views and, being a notoriously cautious historian, has been very reluctant to abandon them. Curiously enough, it is by reason of this fact that the first two chapters of this translation are the best; throughout them can be traced the mangled remains—the third English version—of Professor Kluchevski's "Course."

In view of the crying need of English-speaking students for a compact outline of Russian history, one is disposed to be indulgent to the historian who sees in ancient engravings of Scythians "the typical features of the Aryan race" and who thinks it important to record that Ivan the Terrible "took one wife after another," and to a translator who turns such phrases as "there was a grand fight" or "the great mass of common people lost out": after all, this book, graduating from the Russian high schools, is recommended only to American college students. But even the American college textbook has long outgrown a mere recital of events, arranged according to the reigns of sovereigns. In the present translation no attempt has been made to explain the sequence of events, to account for the phenomena of Russian life, or to relate the history of Russia to the history of Western Europe. Thus the explanation of the independence and prosperity of Great Novgorod is confined to a list of the officials whose election came to depend on the veche; of the rise of the "Soviet Gospod" there is no hint. Again, the oprichnina is presented as a mad freak of Ivan the Terrible; the role of the boyarskaya дума and the mestnichestvo on the one hand and of "Peresvetov" and the agrarian crisis on the other is ignored. Boris Godunov, the Troubles, the Cossacks, the Zemski Sobor (which the editor has oddly seen fit to call the National Assembly)—these and many other topics are left equally unintelligible.

The fault by no means lies with Professor Platonov. In the Russian editions of his work social and economic history is not ignored. But the English version has reduced the bulk of the original by a good half. So drastic has the work of editing been that one is driven to wonder why it was deemed necessary to retain any text at all. Had the material been boiled down just a little more, the whole of it could have been incorporated into the chronological table.

The sense of historical values is gravely distorted. What is one to think of a history of Russia which finds space to mention President Roosevelt and Grand Duke Michael but omits altogether Pobyedonostsev, Witte, Milyukov, Plekhanov, and Lenin? Of a history of Russia that devotes a page to the Muridists and treats of the Tekke Turkomans but mentions the Bolsheviks only once and has no word for the Cadets, the Mensheviks, and the Social Revolutionaries? Of a history of Russia which devotes twice as much space to the "family and court affairs of Ivan III" as to the revolution of 1905?

The book will be a bitter disappointment to the genuine historian. Nothing could be better calculated to stifle the present popular interest in history than to foist on an unsuspecting public such a text.

J. D. CLARKSON

Distinguished Minor Poetry

Those Not Elect. By Léonie Adams. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.50.

MISS ADAMS'S first volume of poems contains such richness in familiar varieties that one might succeed in defining her quality analytically, in many instances phrase by phrase, with quotations from songs out of plays by Ford or Webster, and from Herbert and Carew. One should not expect to find Miss Adams after 1650—nor before the lyrics in "The Broken Heart." Her poetry lacks the eighteenth-century interest in the object noted but not seen—

A pair of garters, half a pair of gloves,
And all the trophies of his former loves —and it lacks the line by line simplicity of the early Elizabethan song:

Pack clouds away and welcome day,
With night we banish sorrow.

Her sensibility, metaphysical in Johnson's sense, has isolated a world somewhere between eighteenth-century decoration and the fresh intensity of a lyric by Thomas Heywood or Greene. For all her aptness in certain early sixteenth-century conventions—typically the subjective dialogue, in her Death and the Lady—the fusion of her qualities brings her closer to Carew than to any other poet. This, again, in spite of a Shakespearean idiom in some of her sonnets:

Since now most precious mines can give no gold
So absolute but it's made metaphor.

But Miss Adams, without any of the older classical machinery, more intensely visualizes and relates her images; she expresses herself in her best poems in terms of something impersonal and beyond conviction—an intense awareness of things. Her probing intensity is a little like that of her contemporary, Louise Bogan. Thus she does not exploit the extended intellectuality of Donne; her intelligence acts within its immediate problems. Her poetry is not an exhibit; it is quiet, serious, static. This last quality is a fixed relation between her and her world; she is not philosophically ambitious. "Never, being damned, see Paradise," writes Miss Adams in the title poem; it is the subject matter of all the verse in this book. Wit, or its current version in dandyism, is a quality that Miss Adams has rejected for a more serious irony; having accepted her own intricately derived world, she doesn't attempt to refute its terms. She is serious without an inversion of sentimentality.

Her irony designs the contexture of her perceptions; it is not a property.

Now is my very marrow gone to dreaming,
And I am stricken by its dream's precision
To live bewildered between blood and sceming.

Her poetry becomes purer, if less directly exciting, when this irony, nearly always introspective, vanishes in a strict contemplation of its "objective reference"—in an absorption in the object itself.

And if a lark shook out his wing,
That shadow on your cheek I found.

Now on dark wounds falls dreamily,
Like a celestial dew, the snow.

Some of the personal, aesthetically unresolved confusion of these two ways of seeing persists, and Miss Adams has written fewer successful poems than an adept artificer of magazine verse would let himself write. Miss Adams is personal, meticulous, detached from ulterior literary motives; a distinguished limited sensibility, she is a distinguished minor poet. There are perhaps five poems in this book of almost ultimate perfection. But the many unrealized poems are honorably committed. She is conscious of a problem in poetic values, and her failures in integrity are worth considerably more than the neat reconstructions of properties into which several of her women contemporaries, after their first interesting successes, have been quickly diverted.

ALLEN TATE

Books in Brief

Honest Liberty in the Church. A Record of the Church Congress in the United States on its Fiftieth Anniversary, A.D. MCMXXIV. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

A collection of sixty-two addresses, of which thirty-eight, with one straddling exception, deal with purely credal and ritual problems, entirely dogmatic and totally irrelevant either to honesty or dishonesty. The twenty-four papers on divorce, remarriage, the standards of the modern home, eugenics, and the Christian approach to the solution of industrial unrest should be subsumed under the heading Dishonest Liberalism in the Church. It is incredible but true that not one of the speakers faces the issues he discusses.

The Recent Foreign Policy of the United States. By George H. Blakeslee. The Abingdon Press. $2.

Professor Blakeslee's account of American post-war diplomacy, originally written as a series of university addresses, is of the nature of a brief rather than a critique. Certainly it lacks the force of some of his earlier work in probing behind the scenes of secret diplomacy. Mr. Hughes could hardly ask for a more comprehensive eulogium upon his official career than these chapters afford. The State Department might well consider giving them wide publicity as an official version of its activities during the past half-dozen years.

Dynamic Psychology. By Dom Thomas V. Moore. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

Psychology. By Everett D. Martin. Peoples Institute Publishing Company. $3.

Professor Moore in a well-written, well-illustrated treatise has attempted to link up a metaphysical soul-stuff with the findings of modern psychology. The content is from clinical observation, from standard experimentation, and from the data collected by the Würzburg School—those present adherents of freedom of will, imageless thought, and other survivals of scholasticism. The book is worth perusal. To phrase psychology in terms of the total going organism, or personality, rather than in terms of a combination of mere sensations and ideas is quite in point. The second book also draws heavily from clinical material and experimentation, but in quite a different spirit. Mr. Martin has attempted to coordinate psychoanalysis and behaviorism, and under his able treatment he has done much to correlate these two apparently opposite standpoints. This book is perhaps the best introduction to psychology for the general reader at hand. Certainly it is much superior for this purpose to the usual textbook.

Drama Oil and Vinegar

MR. MARC CONNELLY and Mr. George Kaufman are that oil and vinegar which have to be mixed for the preparation of a really satisfactory sauce. To the enormously successful "Beggar on Horseback" Mr. Kaufman's vinegar supplied both the acid bite of satire and the snap which no Broadway success can fail to be without; while Mr. Connelly's oil contributed the suave fantasy and the soothing sentiment which gave the combination a flavor all its own. Since then each of these gentlemen has tried it alone, Mr. Kaufman with "The Butter and Egg Man," and now Mr. Connelly with "The Wisdom Tooth" (Little Theater); and each has revealed the fact that he would have been better off with his partner. The first play, in spite of its great popularity, is only rather aridly amusing, and the second, for all its delicate charm, lacks, I fear, the speed and the bite which would make it a commercial success. In the one play one misses Mr. Connelly's originality and richness of imagination; in the other one misses Mr. Kaufman's skill in play-building and one misses also the sharpness of his satiric thrusts. Of the two talents Mr. Connelly's has the rarer quality, but I doubt if it has the robustness necessary to stand alone in a commercial theater.

The new play is a fragile little fantasy, full of quiet humor and all but tearful sentiment. Its hero is a gentle-souled clerk whom life has cowed until he has become but the timid echo of the people among whom he moves, without a soul to call his own or an opinion to which he is willing to hold. Afraid of losing his job, afraid of being ridiculous, and afraid to recognize the worth of his own sensitive nature, he says "yes" to everything and everybody until a girl shows him his cowardice. Then he goes in a dream to find the self-reliant boy he used to be, and at a circus, where he stood up for his own belief in fairy stories against the scorn of a bully, he finds again his lost soul, waking with courage enough to lose his job, to reassert his own character, and to claim the girl. Like Mr. Connelly's former plays, the present one is marked by many touches of original observation and by a tenderness which suggests that if the dream form is enough to make one an expressionist his expressionism is of the sort which stems not from Strindberg but from Barrie. Again and again he wins the smile which brings moisture to the eyes, and he trembles time after time upon the edge of sentimentality; but there is a sincerity and a humor, very gentle but real, which save him always from anything facile or false. It would be a pity if the piece, in spite of an excellent production, marked by an extraordinarily sympathetic performance on the part of Thomas Mitchell, should fail to find its audience; but a play so continuously in a minor key has an inevitable difficulty in getting itself heard.

Mr. Belasco has never shown any predilection for minor keys, and his new production, "Lulu Belle" (Belasco Theater), is no exception to his rule. He has perceived the opportunity afforded by the present interest in Negro life and he has seen how he might make use of that interest in his own way. The play in question, written by Edward Sheldon and Charles McArthur, deals fortissimo with the career of a mulatto courtisan and her spectacular progress from a Harlem cabaret to the night clubs of Paris; but though its subject matter reflects the stir which has been made by little theater plays and recitals of "Blue" songs, it is Belasco through and through from the sledge-hammer emphasis of Lenore Ulric's performance to that ultra-realistic staging to which he has been so consistently faithful. There are five-story tenements with practical fire-escapes and real Negroes on each one; there is a real Ford driven across the stage, and there is the general atmosphere of a spectacle in the circus. There is no doubt that it gets across and no doubt that it will fill the theater for months to come, but it represents, nevertheless, a complete vulgarization of the material with which it deals.

"The Night Duel" is a simple-minded melodrama, employed to give Marjorie Rambeau a vehicle with which to open the handsome new Mansfield Theater. It is devoted to the thesis that "a woman has a right to commit any crime to hold the man she loves." No more need be said except that there is a villain who will put the hero in a sorry pickle unless this hero's wife will consent to spend a night in his house.

The Slav in Macedonia

THE continued oppression of the Bulgarian-speaking population of Greek and Serbian Macedonia constitutes the greatest obstacle to the permanent pacification of the Balkan states. We print below the important sections of a report on the Slav population of western Macedonia which the Secretary General of the International Federation of League of Nations Societies, Professor Th. Ruyssen of Bordeaux University, presented to the meeting of the Commission on Minorities at Lausanne, October 27, 1925:

The condition of the minorities in the eastern part of Macedonia was settled in accordance with a report by the representative of the Greek Government to the Executive Council of the League of Nations on June 10, 1925, at Geneva. . . . The Council accepted this report and expressed its confidence that Greece would fulfil its obligations.

Much less clear is the situation in the western part of Macedonia, which was assigned to Yugoslavia as a result of the Balkan wars of 1912-1913, and still further enlarged by the Treaty of Lausanne. In reality, by the treaty of September 10, 1919, signed between the Allied and Associated Powers and the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, the latter accepted the general principles of the treaties on minorities which . . . placed the protection of the minorities in a large number of countries in Central and Eastern Europe under the control of the League of Nations.

The Yugoslavian Government fulfilled its obligations toward the Albanian, German, Magyar, and other minorities which live within its territory. . . . The case is entirely different, however, with the Slav minorities of western Macedonia. The Government of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes questions even the existence of such a minority, and pretends that the Slav population in this district is identical with the Slav majority of the kingdom. On the other hand, Bulgarians and the mass of emigrants from Macedonia living abroad insist that this Slav population represents in fact a national minority and demand for it the privileges guaranteed by the treaty of September 10, 1919. . . .

This short report, however, does not undertake to discuss in detail a complicated problem, which the passions of the parties interested have beclouded. We shall merely endeavor to establish some facts, as accurate as possible, on which to base a discussion, within, of course, the circle of this committee.

GEOGRAPHICAL BOUNDARIES

Western Macedonia obviously extends on the west from Lake Ohrida on the Albanian frontier to the upper basin of the river Strumnitsa on the east. On the north it extends to the vilayet of Skopie, and on the south somewhat lower than Monastir. Thus it embraces the central basin of the river Vardar and includes the eastern part of the old vilayet of Monastir. In general, Macedonia is a country poorly bounded, without well-defined natural frontiers.

HISTORICAL VIEW

History will help us to understand the character of the present Slav population of the country. Macedonia . . . has passed successively under the yokes of various masters. Nevertheless, it was Bulgarian for a longer time than Serbian. Serbia ruled here less than a century—from 1273 to 1350. . . . The Bulgarians ruled Macedonia from 914 to 1019—a date when the country passed into the hands of the Byzantine emperors—and later, for a second time, from 1196 to 1241. In 1356 the country was invaded by the Turks, and after a few years both Serbs and Bulgars found themselves equally subject for many centuries to the cruel Ottoman yoke. Serbia was politically reborn in the first quarter of the nineteenth century, and Bulgaria in 1878. But Macedonia remained under Turkey until the two Balkan wars (1912-1913) which brought about its division between Serbia, Bulgaria, and Greece. . . .

RELIGION

But one thing is more important in Balkan history than political disturbances, namely, the religious factor. A Bulgarian autonomous church, with its own patriarch, existed from the time when the Bulgarians were converted to Christianity, in the eighth century, up to 1767. Its capital was Ohrida, with Macedonia under its ecclesiastical sovereignty. The patriarchate was destroyed in 1767 in favor of the ecumenical patriarchate of Constantinople. But when the Bulgarian exarchate was created by the firman of February 28, 1870, it was agreed that its jurisdiction should extend over the Slavic churches in Macedonia, if the clergy of this region wished it. . . .

SERBIAN ASPIRATIONS IN MACEDONIA

Another historical fact seems to be well established, namely, that it was only comparatively recently that Serbia began to interest itself in Macedonia. The traditional ambition of the Serbs was to attain the unification, not of all the South Slavs ("Yugoslavia") but to create a "Great Serbia," to include, besides the Serb kingdom proper, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and "Old Serbia," namely, the district of Prizren and Prishtina, which in reality are Serbian and not a part of western Macedonia. It was the Treaty of Berlin (1878) which, by assigning to Austria-Hungary the pure Slav population of Bosnia and Herzegovina, deceived the Serbs and turned their attention toward the south-east—to the valley of the Vardar, in the direction of Salonika and the Ægean Sea. Thus it is less than half a century since the Serbian and Bulgarian aspirations in Macedonia, to which the Greeks also hastened to add their own, found themselves at odds. . . .

THE FACTS OF THE CASE

If one searches for exact facts regarding the actual complexion of the Macedonian population, one will soon be convinced that statistics are as contradictory as they are numerous, and that they are largely compiled under the influence of national aspirations. . . . There is no doubt that on this question the opinion of geographers and travelers not belonging to any of the Balkan races has greater importance. . . .

One specialist in Eastern questions who has traveled up and down the Balkans in every direction, M. Victor Bérard, devotes a large part of his work, "La Turquie et l'hellénisme contemporain" (Paris, 6th ed., 1912), to prove the purely Bulgarian character of the Slavs in Macedonia and the weakness of the Serbian thesis. He personally traveled throughout Macedonia and established the fact that the peasants when asked "What are you?" answer "I'm a Bulgar." M. Louis Léger, professor in the Collège de France, the well-known specialist in Slavic questions, considers Macedonia "a land essentially Bulgarian" (see "Les luttes séculaires des Germains et des Slaves," Paris, 1911, p. 23). The French Colonel Léon Lamouche, who speaks the principal Balkan languages and who has lived in Macedonia a long time, considers that "the villages in the interior of Macedonia are inhabited exclusively by Bulgarians" (see "La Bulgarie dans le passé et le présent," Paris, 1892, p. 144). An Englishman, an authority on Balkan questions, Arthur John Evans, declares that the Bulgarian population exceeds in numbers all other races throughout Macedonia (see "Macédoine telle qu'elle est," an article published in Revue périodique). A German, Professor G. Weigand of the University of Leipzig, expresses the same opinion in "Die nationalen Bestrebungen der Balkanvölker," Leipzig, 1898, p. 192. Again, let us refer to the testimony of the Czechs Vatslov Vondrak and Vladimir Sis, to the Swede Jensen, and, in conclusion, the collective testimony of the Protestant Mission which, on August 5, 1913, in a letter addressed to the Powers, writes: "Macedonia is Bulgarian in origin, in language, and in customs."

A SERBIAN DOCUMENT

Nevertheless this testimony does not exhaust the subject. The Serbs do not deny that the Macedonian Slavs call themselves Bulgarians by name, but they maintain that this nomenclature by no means signifies consciousness of a national unity. One of the best-known defenders of the Serbian cause, M. Gopchevich (in "Macedonien und Altserbien," Vienna, 1889), explains that the Macedonian Slavs systematically avoided calling themselves Serbs in order to avert the hatred of the Turks, who saw in the Serbs their bitterest enemies. Because of this simple precaution the Slavs of Macedonia adopted the name of a Mongolian horde which arrived in the peninsula in the seventh century, a hundred years after the Slavs, but which entirely blended with their Slav predecessors, leaving no trace in the land except their name. And so the Slavs of what is now Macedonia unconsciously make a mistake in calling themselves Bulgarians. This argument is well grounded in part. It is true that the name Bulgarian is not at all Slavic, but is the name of an Urgo-Finnish horde which crossed the Danube in the seventh century and penetrated into the Balkan Peninsula, where they found Slavs already established, by whom they themselves were assimilated. And even today ethnographers discover in the Bulgarians physiological traits which are characteristic of other Turanian races—the Hungarians and the Turks. But this appeal to remote history undoubtedly carries little weight, as it is proved that the Slavs in Macedonia really believe that they differ from the Serbs and energetically insist on their Bulgarian character and demand that, as such, they be treated as a racial minority.

THE LINGUISTIC DISPUTE

Another very active dispute—the linguistic—has arisen between the protagonists of the Serbian and of the Bulgarian contentions. The Serbians claim that the Bulgarian language is a variety of the Yugoslavian language—barely distinguishable from it. The Bulgarian thesis, on the contrary, maintains the original character of the language of the Macedonian Slavs. The truth is that both languages originated from one and the same source—the old Slavonic language, which the Slavs settled in Macedonia spoke before the coming of the Bulgarians. . . . The Bulgarian and Serbian languages have been developing in different directions since the Middle Ages. Serbian, deprived of the definite articles, was compelled to use declensions, and remained, like the Russian, synthetic, while Bulgarian adopted the definite articles and used prepositions, as is the case with Romance languages. . . . The Macedonian dialects, because of these same peculiarities, are clearly connected with the Bulgarian language.

CULTURE

On the other hand, the Serbian contention seems to be upheld by the fact that almost all literary relics in Macedonia are Serbian. . . . The author of this report has not the data to express a dogmatic opinion upon so complicated a question. . . .

The writer cannot refrain from expressing his impressions: First that the majority of non-Slavic authorities whom he consulted categorically state that there exists a real difference between the Macedonian Slavs and the Slavs in Serbia. In view of this, then, the Macedonian Slavs are proved to represent a national minority. At the same time the author has the feeling, which he shares with others, that this difference, however real, is not such as to prevent the relatively easy and speedy rapprochement of the Serbian and Bulgarian elements; neither in type, in languages, institutions, nor in culture are they fundamentally different. So that, in reality, Serbs and Bulgars are varieties of the great South-Slav family, united, at least in part, by a common religion. Under these circumstances, a rapprochement would not be impossible, which would one day bring about assimilation, if both sides made a serious effort of good-will.

On the one hand, it is natural that the Government of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes should be disturbed by the course which Macedonian propaganda often takes. Certain organizations, usually with their headquarters abroad, carry on a purely revolutionary propaganda. The very memorandum addressed to the League of Nations by the representatives of the Slavic minorities in Macedonia, dated September 18, 1924, admits the existence of this revolutionary movement and tries to justify it to a certain extent by the cruel conduct of the Yugoslav Government. However, it is contrary both to the spirit and the letter of the treaties on minorities, which cannot be applied except to minorities which have not broken their loyalty to the states to which they belong. It is not through revolutionary procedure that the Macedonian Slavs will win the good-will of the Belgrade Government.

On the other hand, once it is proved that the Bulgarian institutions in Macedonia—churches, monasteries, schools, gymnasias, etc.—have been closed, and that the Macedonian children (as the memorandum addressed to the League maintains) are compelled to go to Serbian schools, we would be justified in considering that such procedure, too, is no more in accordance with the letter or the spirit of the treaties of 1919, which provided specific regulations to insure the welfare and security of those inhabitants who are nationals of other governments.

It is our duty to make note of the fact that no complaint has reached the committee directly from the Slavic elements of Macedonia who live in the region itself. The complaints, memoranda, and documents have come exclusively from emigrants, the greater part of whom are refugees in Bulgaria, and it is natural that the Serbs should deny the value of such testimony. . . . On the other hand, the number of refugees is so considerable that it is difficult to ascribe to them exclusively political and revolutionary motives. A great number of these refugees appear to be simple peasants, who wish nothing better than to go back to their own fatherland. . . . It is here that a state of affairs appears which is muddled, cruel, and dangerous, to which the committee should certainly call the attention of the governments interested and of the League of Nations.

"MELLON SEES LITTLE DANGER of '27 Deficit"—thus a headline in the press of February 28. Less than three weeks ago he declared that if the bill passed with a cut much above the one he desired ($330,000,000) there would be a "serious Treasury deficit." At the same time the House leaders, according to a dispatch of February 11 to the New York Times, "served notice that the tax reductions must not exceed the total of $327,000,000." Well, the President has signed the tax bill with a cut of $387,000,000 and everybody is happy except that the President warns Congress that it must be good or it will spend $100,000,000 more than our income. Why should Congress pay any attention to that warning if the Secretary of the Treasury, after declaring that he will not permit more of a tax cut than $327,000,000, accepts $387,000,000? As a matter of fact, Mr. Mellon is the world's worst guesser when it comes to Treasury estimates. Thus for 1922 he guessed a deficit of $24,000,000 and for 1923 a deficit of "over $167,000,000." In his annual report for 1923 he even declared that there was an estimated deficit of $822,000,000 at the beginning of the fiscal year. As it happened there was a surplus for 1922 of $314,000,000 and for 1923 a surplus of $310,000,000. Mr. Mellon's guess for 1923 having been thus only $1,132,000,000 out of the way! For 1924 his guess was $180,000,000 surplus; actually it turned out to be $505,000,000. But who cares now what Mr. Mellon guesses or if he directly contradicts his beloved President? No one objects to this looseness of financial government if he can get his taxes cut, least of all the twenty-two multi-millionaires who, according to Basil Manly of the Peoples' Legislative Service, will save no less than $11,658,571 in income taxes by the signing of this tax bill. Poor, dear Mr. Mellon himself saves $823,348. Why should he worry if Congress has gone further than he wished and his guesses are always wrong?

IF THE ALUMINUM COMPANY of America is ever brought to book it will be marvelous indeed. Not only has the Attorney General ruled that the Aluminum Company has evaded no law, but on February 26 the Senate by a vote of 36 to 33 refused to adopt the majority report of its Judiciary Committee criticizing the Department of Justice for inaction and censuring the Attorney General for his ignorance concerning the litigation. As has happened on other occasions, the motion was lost by the defection of Democrats, Bruce of Maryland and Blease of South Carolina. Three others were absent, Shipstead because of illness. Had these five voted aye, as there was every reason to expect, the motion would have passed. It has now been officially stated that Secretary Mellon, instead of being a majority stockholder, owns only 16 per cent of the company. But the fact remains that the Federal Trade Commission has reported that the Aluminum Company is a flagrant lawbreaker. If there is any further evidence needed of this, let us quote the following from the New York Herald Tribune apropos of the Federal Trade Commission's further inquiry into this trust:

PITTSBURGH, Feb. 17.—As complete a control of a single industry, in this case the manufacture of aluminum, as ever has been known in the history of the world is expected to be shown when probably 750 pieces of correspondence between the Aluminum Company of America and independent manufacturers are revealed to the public, probably about the middle of April.

And it is the Herald Tribune itself which has been so ardent in its defense of this trust.

SENATORS BORAH AND REED began their attack upon our adherence to the World Court, in Chicago, amid much red fire and attended by a procession of 3,000 automobiles which covered thirty-five miles. The first result has been that Senator McKinley has come running to the White House demanding aid to protect him from the onslaughts of these gentlemen who have marked him for slaughter in the April primaries when he comes up for renomination. The White House itself is adhering to its rule of playing safe and not going to the rescue of endangered vassals, but in this case it is "understood" that important officials will be dispatched to speak in Illinois. The most interesting question in regard to this militancy of Senator Borah is whether it will encourage him sufficiently to make him an open aspirant for the Republican presidential nomination against Mr. Coolidge. It is well known in Washington that Senator Couzens has offered to back Senator Borah financially. Few of the Washington newspaper fraternity believe that Senator Borah will finally decide to challenge the President, with the latter's control of the official machinery and his ability to pocket the Southern Negro delegations. Yet it would be most refreshing if Mr. Borah should decide to fight it out in the primaries, if only because we should then once more have a first-rate intellect in search of the Presidency and a man who could reveal most damaging secrets of the political charnel house if he wished to do so.

IF WE ARE TO RUN CRYING to the federal government every time we get a bump or a fright, we may as well abandon local government—and thus largely self-government—in this country. The federal government is far too ready to intrude in local spheres as it is; it does not need any urging. Hence we regret the extraordinary request that the Better Government Association of Chicago has made for a congressional investigation into crime in that city. To what end? The Congress could do little or nothing, as it has virtually no jurisdiction over any of the crime from which Chicago is suffering, except violation of the liquor laws. We can well believe that conditions are bad in Chicago and that part, at least, of the local administration is in league with the criminal element. But either Chicago can save itself or it is not worth saving. It is babyish for any of its citizens to run whining to Washington for assistance. We like better the report on crime of a committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce which recommends action by the State—the proper authority to deal with the matter. The committee says, sensibly, that improvement should be sought by better administration, not by more laws, and suggests an association of private citizens to help bring this about. Governor Smith of New York is recommending a State inquiry into crime, but it remains to be shown whether such action would be anything but a moral gesture and a sea of words.

WE MAY BE ENJOYING an era of unbounded prosperity, but the unending warfare between capital and labor does not appreciably abate. The armistice in anthracite is followed by three outbreaks in the garment trades in the New York district. Twenty-six thousand members of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union were ready to call a strike in 1,000 shops, their employers were ready to bring an injunction against them, when Judge Joseph M. Proskauer stepped in and succeeded in effecting a temporary settlement. The fur workers in New York are on strike for a forty-hour week and for a plan by which employers are asked to keep the full force on the pay roll during slack seasons. Instead of laying off one man entirely and keeping another man on at full time—the strikers demand that both men be kept on at half time—or whatever ratio the exigencies of the situation require. This may not make for more operating efficiency, but it certainly means less human waste and hardship. Finally, in Passaic, New Jersey, the textile workers have tied up the worsted mills in an endeavor to secure shorter hours, better working conditions, and increased wages.

JUST AS WILSON'S place in history will be determined chiefly by the fate of the League of Nations that of Briand will be fixed by the results of the treaties of Locarno. So far as the rest of his career goes Briand has been little more than an average old-school politician. He does not pretend to be a financier and is contributing no ideas of his own to the terribly difficult problem now before France of keeping out of bankruptcy. But at Lo-carno he seemed to have attained for himself, and to inject into others, a new political spirit—one supremely needed in Europe today. He has revealed the same qualities in the debates in the French Parliament on the ratification of the Locarno agreements. In the United States oratory has fallen into disuse, not to say disrespect. In France it still survives and Briand is one of its prophets. When he talks of the spirit and aims of Locarno he says things to which his countrymen and all Europe may well give ear. But mere oratory is not enough; Briand has yet to show the world how much he personally will dare and sacrifice for Locarno. As he himself said the other day: "One can throw a whole people into war without giving them time or possibility for reflection. But peace demands continuous, prolonged, tenacious service."

THE ARTICLE upon the Italian debt situation which we publish in this issue is the first of a series by Mr. Murphy. That The Nation has complete confidence in Mr. Murphy goes without saying, but the responsibility for particular statements is his. We believe that with the arrival in Paris of General Cesare Rossi, formerly Mussolini's confidential lieutenant, we are on the verge of sensational revelations as to the true character both of fascism and of its leader. Mussolini and his administration have become the greatest menace to peace in Europe, and we are emphatically of the opinion that so far as Mr. Murphy touches upon the warlike plans of the dictatorship he does so with all moderation. As to Italian finances, we believe that Mr. Murphy is doing a great service to American investors in setting forth the facts. Our bankers, too, ought to be very sure as to the destination of funds loaned in Italy. If Mr. Murphy's contentions are correct, as we feel they are, not one additional dollar of American money should go to the Italians until they have purged themselves of this despot and his whole crew and restored democratic government, liberty, and justice in their country.

THE WILL OF the late Emperor Francis Joseph, drawn up in 1901, has just been made public. Of all the forms of immortality devised by man, perhaps the most uncertain is that by which he seeks after death to control his earthly means. By a meticulous series of arrangements Francis Joseph tried to barricade his estate against every possible whim of fortune, whether it be the childlessness of some heirs, or the divorce of others, or even "if, in the course of time and historical development, the monarchy's form of government should be changed and—God forbid!—the Crown not remain with our house. . . ." In the last event, which was, in the Emperor's eyes, centuries distant, the latifundia or family fortune of 60,000,000 kronen was to be governed in its succession by the Civil Code of 1811. The Emperor provided, in fact, for every whim of fortune, excepting only the one which actually took place—the depreciation of the currency—which reduced his stately latifundia to the approximate value of $850. His twenty-eight castles and estates have been confiscated everywhere except in Hungary, in which alone, of all the states at whose birth the empire died, the Hapsburgs have retained their rights. His 146,000,000 kronen in money assets were for the most part in stocks and bonds which are now merely printed paper. And, as a final stroke of irony, part of the Emperor's generosity bids fair to deprive his heirs of what little they may have saved from the wreck of the falling crown, for the Emperor's servants—or the Socialists for them—are suing the heirs for their pensions as provided in the will, and demanding that the pensions be paid in gold.

THE SUDDEN DEATH of Mrs. Laura Nelson Kirkwood in a Baltimore hotel, at the age of only 43, precipitates a most interesting journalistic situation. By the death of her father, Colonel William R. Nelson, owner of the Kansas City Star and Kansas City Times, Mrs. Kirkwood became the life beneficiary of her father's $8,000,000 estate. This now passes to a perpetual board of trustees comprising the presidents of the universities of Missouri, Kansas, and Oklahoma. The historic newspapers are to be sold within two years and the proceeds from the sale are to be reinvested. The entire estate is to be "managed for public purposes forever," and it is further provided that "the net income of the rents thereof shall be used for the purchase of works of art and reproductions of works of the fine arts, such as paintings, engravings, sculptures, tapestries, and rare books, the purpose being to procure works and reproductions of works of fine arts which will contribute to the delectation and enjoyment of the public generally, but not usually provided for by public funds." There is provided by the will of Mrs. Nelson a museum to house the fine arts collected by the trustees. Thus Kansas City will soon be in a position to make itself a genuine art center if the large sums to be expended by the trustees are wisely invested. What will become of the Nelson newspapers is a question which will agitate the newspaper world until it is settled. While they have lost much of their prestige and some of their influence since Colonel Nelson's death, they are still the most powerful papers between the Mississippi and the Pacific Coast. Thus their future ownership and policy is a matter of importance to a large section of the country.

THE CENSORSHIP of college publications continues at a monotonous pace. From every section of the country come reports of magazines or issues of magazines which some rather vague "Committee of the Faculty" has decided must never meet the tender eyes of undergraduates. The editor of the Candle at Ohio State University complains in his latest number that "Every publication on the campus is censored from the harmless Ag Student" on down to the "heretical" journal of opinion which he somehow keeps going. The story is an old one, and there is something to be said for the theory that the danger of suppression increases as a sophomore's zest in what he writes and chooses to publish. But the spectacle is dreary at best, seeing that it fills so broad a stage and lasts so long. An issue of the Occident at the University of California has been killed because it contained a story of Joseph and Jesus which "the authorities" found blasphemous. The editor of the Illinois Magazine at the University of Illinois has been deposed because he printed a series of "Zinc City Sketches" dealing with the city of La Salle. Certain citizens of the town did not like the sketches, visited the university, and the editor went. The episode, we fear, is significant. When the faculties of State universities become responsible to the heads of zinc smelteries or to any other citizens, literature and education are not safe. Public opinion, calling as it does here and there for anti-evolution laws, is perhaps dangerous enough. Committees of manufacturers are decidedly more so.

ONE OF THE BEST chapters in the endless biography of H. G. Wells which some day someone will write will concern itself with Mr. Wells's quarrels. We are not asking that his little private tiffs be tracked and aired. In one of his utopian volumes he has insisted that in the perfect society the individual shall remain inviolate within whatever circle of thoughts and emotions he may wish to keep sacred. But his altercations in the press—these are delightful, and they make history. Not long ago he had it back and forth with Henry Arthur Jones. Both men were witty, and so it could be said of Mr. Wells, as Falstaff said of himself, that he had been the cause of wit in other men—Mr. Jones on his own having never been so very funny. Now it is Mr. Wells and Poultney Bigelow. Mr. Bigelow's "Seventy Summers," recently reviewed in The Nation by our gallant British friend, H. W. Nevins, contained, it seems, the story of a tea party at the house of the Countess Russell, to which both Mr. Wells and Mr. Bigelow came. Mr. Bigelow recorded that Mr. Wells had looked like "a lucky stockbroker or traveling salesman" and had talked in a loud voice about his tremendous royalties. Mr. Wells, replying in the London papers, seems to be grieved less by the image of the drummer than by the tale of the royalties. Mr. Bigelow, he insists, was so "ill-mannered" as to press him concerning his profits; and he, after murmuring a few replies, was so bored that he could no longer "delight openly in Bigelow." Mr. Bigelow deposes that if he is a bore his career as a speaker is ruined; and sues Mr. Wells for $50,000. As for us, we are amused, and hope to be still more so as the war goes on. But we hope also that neither party will in the end be poorer by a penny.

GILBERT MURRAY is the first scholar chosen to hold the Charles Eliot Norton annual professorship of poetry at Harvard, and he is certainly the most distinguished of all who are available. The professorship itself, the gift of C. C. Stillman of New York, is an interesting analogue of the famous chair at Oxford which has been filled by such men as Thomas Warton, Matthew Arnold, W. J. Courthope, and W. P. Ker. The chief difference between the two seems to be that the American term is for one year, whereas the Professor of Poetry at Oxford retains his title until his death. The stipulation of the donor that the word poetry be given the broadest possible interpretation in the lectures delivered at Harvard is one which Professor Murray will appreciate, since his approach to literature and art has always been made through the extensive field of a ripe and humane learning. It is announced that he will be in residence between September and December of the present year and that he will give eight or nine lectures on "The Classical Tradition in Poetry." The historian of the Greek epic, the analyst of Greek religion, and the translator of Euripides will surely have much to say that is interesting and important, and students will look for a volume as significant as was the "Five Stages of Greek Religion," which Professor Murray delivered in the form of lectures at Columbia University a number of years ago. The world of American letters will cordially welcome Professor Murray when he arrives in Cambridge next fall. The exchange professorships and scholarships which are growing common in modern education are an excellent sign of the increasing internationalization of scholarship. From that the movement will spread into other fields.

Housing the People

GOVERNOR SMITH'S proposal for improving housing conditions in New York State—by which is meant specifically New York City—is now public. It was suggested in his annual message to the Legislature. Now we are given the details, duly embodied in a bill together with the report of the Commission on Housing and Regional Planning, whose gloomy researches into housing conditions in the metropolis provide the most potent reasons why something immediate and drastic should be done. The commission, of which Clarence S. Stein is chairman, has been holding hearings and conducting investigations for many months. It finds that private enterprise as a means for securing decent houses for the bulk of New York City's population has completely broken down. At present it is building only for the upper third. "The cost of construction and especially the cost of money make it impossible to rent or sell new construction at prices available to two-thirds of our families." The building boom of the past five years, the commission finds, has brought no relief to those who live in congested tenement areas. If the present rate of demolition be maintained it will be 138 years before the last of the tenements has disappeared that were declared subnormal by the Tenement House Law of 1901. Only 3 per cent of the new construction of 1924 rents within the purses of 70 per cent of the population. By and large, all families with incomes of less than $2,500 a year—and that means more than two-thirds of all families in the city—"are afforded no decent place in which to live, to rear children, and to enjoy a home life."

Housing conditions are directly responsible for widespread criminal activities, for lowered moral standards, for the prevalence of tuberculosis and pneumonia.

Home becomes a place to be avoided. All members of the family seek to spend their leisure time elsewhere. . . . The evil of doubling up families in small apartments, far from abating, in the last two years has grown steadily worse. The male lodger is in the small home in larger numbers than ever before with all the attendant degrading potentialities of family life and morals. Congestion is growing and spreading; families are not only crowding themselves with lodgers, but in many cases there is a double shift, night and day, of lodgers.

The City Board of Child Welfare tells of children hiring cellars for clubrooms in order to escape from their homes. Over one-thirteenth of the city's population, it appears, is living at a density of 600 people to the acre. The worst slums of Paris and of London show a maximum density to the acre of only 434 and 365 respectively.

But the impressive thing about the commission's report is not the crowding of the slums but the shoe-horning and jamming of the middle classes. One must be either a pants manufacturer or a bootlegger before one has room in which to swing a cat—for the skilled worker, the clerk, the professional man, a swing is likely to land one down the dumb-waiter or out in the alley. And let it be repeated, and repeated: There is not the vestige of a hope that private enterprise can ever better the situation. Laissez-faire is bankrupt in the premises. It is as dead as the Neanderthal Man.

In this impasse what, specifically, does Governor Smith propose? His bill sets up a State Housing Board, a State Housing Bank, and a limited-dividend private corporation (as many of the latter as need be). The State Housing Board is to exert general supervision over new housing projects. The State Housing Bank is to finance the projects. The limited-dividend corporation is to do the actual construction work, and to operate the properties after they are built. A reduction of 1 per cent in the interest rate on the capital cost of a building means the reduction of rents by more than $1 per room per month. Under present conditions, speculative building requirements entail an average rate of 9 or 10 per cent on the money employed. If the State Housing Bank can cut this rate to 4 or 5 per cent, the potential saving is in the neighborhood of $5 per room per month. Furthermore, it is a commonplace that genuine improvements so tend to force up land values that the economies of such improvements are skimmed off by the land speculator before they can reach the ultimate tenant. Therefore the State Housing Bank is given the power of condemnation, which, if exercised in sufficiently large units, will go far to keep the land speculator's feet out of the trough. Furthermore, the Housing Bank's bonds will be tax exempt, thus making for a final element of saving.

A housing project may be initiated by a group of individuals spontaneously or it may be suggested to them by the State Housing Board. The group will take steps to form a limited-dividend company. The company's physical plan must first be approved by the Housing Board and then referred to the Housing Bank, which passes upon the financial plan. The bank will then proceed to condemn the property in question. One-third of the total cost of the project will be supplied by the limited-dividend company through the sale of stock on which dividends cannot exceed 6 per cent. The remaining two-thirds will be provided by the bank through the sale of tax-exempt State housing bonds, at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent. The bonds are a first lien on the property. The bank, having secured the land by condemnation, leases it to the company for a term of fifty years. The rate of amortization is fixed to write off 75 per cent of the cost of the improvement in the fifty-year period. The operation of the property by the company is at all times subject to supervision by the board and the bank.

Such in brief is the Governor's plan, "drawn with a view to retaining the advantages of private investment and private management without the present drawbacks." Already the Real Estate Board of New York has charged that the proposal "reeks with moral turpitude." If moral turpitude consists in an honest attempt to reduce crime, disease, and discomfort, and to make life for two-thirds of the people of New York a little more worth the living, the Real Estate Board is welcome to make the most of it. The bill will face rough seas at Albany. If passed, will it correct the conditions it is designed to correct? Perhaps. If condemnations are widespread enough; if the combination of State and private company does not prove too cumbersome; if the limited-dividend principle does not follow the very hazardous course it has followed in England; if . . . a good many things. But granted the State cannot build houses directly for its own people when all other means have failed, then the Governor's proposal deserves the fullest support for a trial period.

The Rising Tide of Prejudice

IT was Booker Washington's theory, widely proclaimed and usually applauded by Southern whites, that if the Negroes only learned trades and proceeded to follow them diligently and to mind their own business all would be well and they would become happy and prosperous. Well, one colored man, A. J. Herndon, took that advice, became a barber and developed the largest and finest barber shop in the city of Atlanta, well situated on the main thoroughfare. Reinvesting his profits he made $100,000 in Florida real estate, built a modern office building in Atlanta, and organized a life insurance company with a capital of $100,000. What has happened? Instead of receiving the plaudits of the city the Council of Atlanta has passed an ordinance prohibiting Negro barbers from serving white patrons. The attack originated apparently with the white barbers' union which skilfully took advantage of the craze for bobbed hair and had much to say of the shocking sight of seeing white women having their hair cut by colored men. This means the wiping out in Atlanta of barber shops for whites representing an invested capital of $200,000. What is more remarkable is that it is only a few years since any white men could be found in the South to perform this "menial" service for anybody. Thus the reward for virtue, industry, and thrift for colored barbers in Atlanta is their being deprived of their livelihood unless they can replace their white patrons by colored ones, which at best means a reconstruction of their business and the removal of their shops.

This ordinance was not passed unwittingly and thoughtlessly, as the weak-kneed Atlanta Constitution declares, but by a majority of the members of the Council. The bravest and most worth-while paper in Georgia, Julian Harris's Columbus Enquirer-Sun, not only gives the lie to the Constitution and its flagrant warping of the truth in stating that no thoughtful and honest Negro leader in Georgia will declare "that Georgia does not treat its Negro fairly in every way," but quietly asks why the Atlanta Council should not prohibit banks conducted by whites from receiving deposits from Negroes and also the employment by whites of Negro cooks, Negro nurses, and Negro laundresses. It also seeks to know why Negroes should not be barred from all department stores, or any other stores in which white clerks have to wait upon them. Logic would dictate this and many similar courses. Incidentally, the Enquirer-Sun asks the Constitution, which is so afraid of the Ku Klux Klan and other anti-Negro elements, if it ever heard of the case of a Klansman by the name of Fox who entered the office of a Mr. Coburn and assassinated him, and of a Negro by the name of Hicks who stole a mule worth $50? Hicks, the Negro, was sentenced to twenty years at hard labor for taking the mule, and Fox, the Klansman and white man, was given ten years for murder. Thus is justice dispensed to the Negro in Georgia! Fortunately, the protests from individuals and from various other Georgia newspapers besides the Enquirer-Sun have thus far prevented the mayor from signing the ordinance. But it has not yet been rejected.

In Virginia there is Hampton Institute, one of the great institutions of the South, which has also been practicing the doctrines of Booker Washington in that it has been preparing the Negroes for trades ever since the Civil War. If there is a more valuable institution in Virginia we do not know it. As our readers are aware, it has been the pioneer in the industrial education of the Negro; by the sanity and strength and power of General Armstrong, the founder, and his successors, it has been a great influence for civilization for both whites and blacks. For years the whites from neighboring towns have gone, often uninvited, to the excellent entertainments offered at Hampton. Now at the instigation of a local editor a bill has been passed by the House of Delegates in Richmond, with only two dissenting votes, forbidding the sitting together in any gathering within the State of Virginia of white and black people. It is a general bill pretending to apply to the whole State, but deliberately aimed at Hampton because the white guests at the Hampton entertainments have sat alongside colored students and teachers. If passed it will seriously interfere with the efficiency of Hampton which has always had white and colored members on its faculty. It will place the school's administration between the devil and the deep sea, for the colored people will not come to Hampton as they have heretofore, if there is to be segregation within its walls. Should the Governor sign this un-American and undemocratic bit of special legislation we trust that the school will take its constitutionality up to the Supreme Court if necessary, and, if it loses, remove the school to a civilized State. Hampton has contributed enormously to the material and social progress of Virginia. If this piece of prejudice is really enacted into law, the State should lose the school and the entire country be notified that Virginia is insincere when it declares that it wishes the Negro to be trained along industrial lines and to be treated with justice.

The New Stage-Craft

THE strange but extraordinarily effective stage-setting used by the Moscow Art Theater for its production of "Carmencita and the Soldier" affords but a mild example of the results of the theatrical radicalism which is agitating the producers of all European countries. The International Theatrical Exposition now open for a short time at Steinway Hall will, however, afford to New Yorkers an admirable opportunity to get some inkling of the extent and variety of the movement, for the exhibit, originally a part of the Exposition des Arts Décoratifs at Paris, but now enriched by various American additions, includes models supplied by the experimental theaters of eighteen countries. The Odéon is not too tame nor Kiesler too wild for the catholic taste of the committee, and here by consequence one may get some idea of the whole range of experiment from its timid center to the very extreme of its lunatic fringe. Cubists, synthesists, constructivists, and bio-mechanists have been allowed to do their best or their worst, as the case may be, and the result is a stimulating chaos amid which one may distinguish the confident voice of many conflicting creeds. The Austrian Fritz offers his block-stage with its flexible arrangement of cubistic masses; Prampolini of Italy illustrates the possibilities of his "Poly-dimensional Stage"; Tairov presents some models from his famous Kamerny Theater in Moscow. Friedrich Kiesler of Vienna, who "believes that the future city must be built entirely in space, free from the ground," and who has invented a theater without either stage or actors, is director of the exposition. Picasso also has some exhibits, and a performance of George Antheil's symphony for ten electrical pianos, four electrical drums, and four electrical xylophones is also promised.

The movement which the exposition illustrates has, to be sure, its comic side, but at bottom it is an attempt, which has already borne fruit, to expand in different directions the possibilities of the theater. It is based upon a realization that there are potentialities in the spectacle which are not confined to the presentation of realistic literary plays in a realistic setting. Even the most extreme of its experiments serve at the very least to test the limit to which any particular source of appeal may be pushed. One need not wish to see all scenery and all actors banished from the stage to make place for shifting lights and shadows, and one need not believe that, in the words of the official spokesman for the exhibition, "the literary theater is dead" because "this is an optical age." But one cannot deny that those whose enthusiasm for new modes of expression leads them into the most sweeping of dogmatisms have made contributions which more conservative directors have been glad to use. The theater represents a synthetic art, but the pioneer has generally little temperamental sympathy with synthesis. He rides his hobby as far as it will carry him, and it is none of his concern if one of his fellows has ridden an equal distance in the opposite direction. While one director is banishing the actor completely in order to make a scenic spectacle the all in all, another is banishing, as the Moscow Musical Studio did, all decoration whatsoever and attempting to make the stage nothing except a place upon which people can act.

In viewing the exposition one cannot but observe that the general tendency is in a direction diametrically opposed to that Oriental opulence of color and that rather feminine exuberance of facile decoration which the influence of Bakst made for a time the fashion in American theatrical spectacles. France still leads in charm, but perhaps because of the leadership of revolutionary Russia a certain austerity of form is a common element in nearly all the most interesting designs whether they take the form of cubistic masses, mere platforms, or those strange arrangements of levers and wheels affected by the constructivists. Some of them are merely ugly, but there are others which achieve a surprising beauty which seems wrested, as it were, from forms which in themselves promise nothing; as though the artists who constructed them had gone forth resolutely into an ugly world and, scorning any escape, had demanded that it yield up to them some loveliness. One cannot, of course, judge very surely of the effectiveness of any theatrical setting without seeing upon it the action for which it was designed, but, to take a single example, the block-stage would, we fancy, fit admirably the requirements of any play which possessed an abstract austerity corresponding to its forms. Here amid the uncompromising outlines of its masses which seem to suggest the immovable weight of our industrial civilization might be acted some stark tragedy of industrialism—the story of a commercial King Lear or of some proletarian Antigone. Granted a sufficient elevation of tone, no play needs realism; but it does need some mise-en-scène which will fit its mood. The Greeks thought in terms of slender columns and graceful capitals; a section at least of the world today thinks in terms less serenely beautiful, and if from that section should come our great play it must have a setting like itself.

For Whose Benefit?

ON February 25 a Washington dispatch reported that "with more than half a dozen Senators barricading themselves behind cloakroom doors, the Senate was unable tonight to obtain the quorum necessary to decide whether the Navajo Indians are to be taxed $106,630 for the construction of bridges from which, it was admitted, they will not benefit."

The proposed appropriation, along with $100,000 furnished by the State of Arizona, will be used mainly to build a bridge across the Colorado River at Lee's Ferry, Arizona. The first-named sum would seem a modest one were it not that the measure calling for it provides that it shall be reimbursed to the government from Navajo Indian funds obtained through the sale of oil on the Navajo Reservation, which extends westward as far as the Colorado River. One hundred thousand dollars is certainly a good deal of money for the Navajos to pay unless the bridge is to benefit them greatly. Secretary Work says that it will—that it will furnish an important outlet for the Navajo Indians, facilitating their communication with the whites, and assisting them in their progress to a more advanced civilization. . . . In view of the fact that they will derive great benefit from the proposed bridge, estimated to equal the benefit which will be derived by the white settlers, it would be reasonable that the $100,000 . . . remain a charge upon the lands and funds of these Indians until paid.

The American Indian Defense Association, unwilling to take Secretary Work's word for this, has investigated the matter and published its conclusions. The bridge will furnish the Navajos an outlet into a region which has never interested them and never will do so. If they want to cross the river after deer they can use the existing ferry. More than that they scarcely will desire, since the regions of Arizona and Utah which lie opposite this portion of their reservation—the thinnest populated portion of all—are the least occupied inhabitable regions of the United States. The few whites who happen to be there are notorious for their hostility to the Piute Indians of southern Utah, and only three years ago "civilized" Old Chief Posey and his band with a lynching party. The advantages to Navajo trade will be nil. Salt Lake City, which the bridge will make accessible to the reservation, is from six to ten times further away than the trading posts southward along the Santa Fé Railway—Flagstaff, Holbrook, and Gallup. And finally, the Navajos need this $100,000, payment of which will exhaust their annual revenue from oil, for their fight against trachoma, from which a third of them suffer, for the digging of more wells to supply their sheep, for the improvement of their roads, and for the education of their children, most of whom have no schools to go to.

Who will benefit by the bridge? Automobile tourists between Salt Lake City and the Grand Canyon, between the Santa Fé route and the various northern trails, and between the national parks north and south will be excellently served, and possibly it is well that they should be. But no discoverable good will be done the Indians, most of whose accumulated capital will thus be wiped out. It seems plain enough that the burden should fall upon the tourists themselves through taxes, upon the national park system, and upon the State of Arizona. It is to be hoped that Congress will refuse to further Secretary Work's grotesque proposal.

The Universe, Inc. By H. v. L.

AT THE CLASS DINNER I met Bill Whoozis and he was delighted to see me. "I wish you'd come and see me," he said, "I mean it. Come and see me! Only remember one thing, old Hank, you were always too darn much of a radical anyway.

—Now, remember, I live in one of those simple towns on the plains where the high winds make strong men. None of your parlor socialists where I come from. So when you come just don't tell them that you work for The Nation and Harper's and the Survey and all that red stuff —for we are simple old-fashioned Muricans. Red-blooded fellows, and let one of your dirty Bolsheviki as much as make a face at one of our great leaders of democracy and —the next day a hundred million strong-fisted he-men will be on the march —and if it takes our last cent and our last drop of red blood and if we have to set the whole world afire to do it

—we are going to get that fellow and hang him on the highest gallows in the land so that everybody will be warned that they can't start nothing with us. So come and see me and behave yourself and there is a good fellow."

And so a few months later I got me ready to go to this town of virile men. But when about a thousand miles away I began to meet an endless procession of hurrying trains, horribly overloaded with panic-stricken humanity.

And when I finally reached my destination, behold, every man, woman, and child was gone. "Aha," I said to myself, "the great crusade has started. The army of righteousness has gone forth to battle for Jehovah." And then —I turned a corner and there in a neglected ash-can lay a three-day-old newspaper. And I had my answer.

Financing Italy's Madness

By JAMES MURPHY

I

THE discussion of the Italian debt in the United States offers a tempting opportunity to bring out some facts in regard to Fascist finance. Last July the Fascist Government dropped Minister Di Stefani from the Ministry of Finance and put Count Volpi in his place. The gesture was significant. The previous fall Di Stefani had approached London bankers on the question of a loan, but had failed. Thereupon the Fascists decided to turn to the United States. Volpi was chosen as head of the delegation which was to go to Washington. He is the tool of the industrialists and the bankers—particularly of the dominating financial group, the Banca Commerciale. He has never shown any large capacity in the field of national finance, but has appeared as a shrewd and sharp negotiator in commercial and financial deals.

The Banca Commerciale and the Credito Italiano are the two leading banking groups in Italy. Between them they hold the hegemony of Italian finance and therefore control the industrialists. The Banca Commerciale was originally introduced by some German finance agents into Italy. It commenced with a capital of less than half a million dollars; but it has now earned a huge fortune and has become one of the strongest international financial institutions in existence. It has much wider international interests than the Credito Italiano and it has made its chief aim the control of the Fascist Government. That control is now practically complete; for Volpi may be looked upon as the receiver for the Banca Commerciale, installed in the Ministry of Finance. On the Washington delegation Mario Alberti represented the Credito Italiano.

What were Volpi's instructions when he set out for the United States? He was told to come back with a loan at any cost. That was the object of his visit. The settlement of the debt was envisaged merely as a preliminary necessity to the securing of a loan. Volpi was ordered to accept any debt-settlement terms whatsoever, but to strive to make the payments as low as possible for a period of five or ten years. It has appeared strange to many that Italy showed herself so ready all of a sudden, about twelve months ago, to arrange for the payment of her foreign war debts. The thesis originally held was that these debts were not really due and that anyhow Italy could never pay them. That is still the thesis of the official Fascist propagandists. In 1922 Mr. Bonar Law offered practically to cancel Italy's debt to England for a consideration that was a mere bagatelle. But the Italians refused even to part with the bagatelle. Why do they now agree to pay almost the full amount not only to America but also to England? The answer is that these settlements are not undertaken in the interests of the country but in the interests of the banking concerns that back Fascism. The banks that have supported the Fascist Government require foreign gold to fill up the void created by this expense. This is a point which seems to have been missed abroad—the relation of Fascism to the financiers.

It was the banking plutocracy that originally backed the whole Fascist show. They are the impresarios. Mussolini and his troupe are merely the star turn. One incident alone is enough to show this relationship. Immediately after the declaration of Polish independence the Banca Commerciale went into some heavy speculations in that country. Then came the financial distress which was general through Europe in 1920, 1921, and 1922, and which was accentuated in Poland by the Russian war in 1920. The Banca Commerciale, finding itself unable to release its capital in Poland, turned to the Fascist Government, with the result that the scandalous Polish loan was arranged in the spring of 1924. According to the terms of the loan the capital sum was to be $20,000,000, at interest of 7 per cent. The loan was issued at 89, and to the Banca Commerciale was granted the sole right of issue. The Italian treasury guaranteed the loan and the Banca Commerciale thus received eight points of the eighty-nine simply for its trouble in saying good morning to the public and taking in their money. Poland was to receive only 81 per cent of the 89 paid up and that 81 per cent was to be spent in Italy. In other words, the Banca Commerciale was to hold all the cash on behalf of Poland. Not only that, but it must have made a neat profit of something like 18 per cent for the trouble of receiving the money which the unfortunate Italian public paid the bank to replace its foolish investments abroad—at least three million dollars.

I have mentioned the foregoing because it would be impossible to understand the Fascist war-debt policy unless one knew something of the forces that are at work behind the scenes. When the financial crash comes only the populace will suffer; for it is with the people's savings that the banking plutocracy works. Whether it be peace or war, prosperity or poverty, the financial wire-pullers who now have Italy at their mercy will make money. It is in their interests that the state budget has been faked. The purpose of the faking was to make Americans believe that the Fascist regime had restored economic and financial prosperity to Italy and was therefore worthy of financial support. As a matter of fact, the present economic and financial conditions of Italy are appalling to anyone who knows the country from the inside and knows how the government departments are run. Outstanding debts and disbursements are buried away in the ledgers of the several ministries without ever appearing in the state budget. The Fascists have introduced what they call the system of deferred debits, which means that the Government spends a billion dollars, for instance, on public works in one year and merely debits a twelfth of it on the state budget. The deferred debits which have piled up in this way since the Fascists came into power amount now to about twenty milliard lire, nearly $1,000,000,000. But that is only one item. Nobody knows what the extent of the floating debt now is. There is no parliamentary control and no trustworthy figures are published; but the orgy of spending goes on. Almost every day new orders-in-council allocate grants to one Fascist undertaking after another and the allocation is entered in the accounts of whatever ministry may appear convenient at the moment. Thus the expenses of the national militia, which now reaches a total of 380,000 armed men in the service, are scattered among the ledgers of the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministry of War, and the state railway department.

A favorite means of fabricating accounts is to unload state expenses onto the municipal budgets. It is particularly interesting to note that a recent decree lays the expenses of "preventive incarceration" on the municipalities. In Fascist Italy this item of expense has been growing by leaps and bounds. There is no habeas corpus, and preventive incarceration means that the Fascist police arrest anybody pointed out as against the regime, throw him into jail, and leave him there, without even bringing a charge against him.

II

Are the American bankers aware of the purposes which their loans to Italy are destined to serve?¹ It hardly seems possible; I think the bankers would be shrewd enough not to put money into a concern which they knew was being driven headlong to ruin. Let me take a few instances of the allocations which are already being made of the American loan.

The Fascist press has informed the public that $40,000,000 of the loans which are to be raised in the United States as a result of the debt settlement will be spent in the creation of Imperial Rome. We may presume that the Roman municipality will give some sort of mortgage as collateral for the money. But of what value is a mortgage on Rome today? The municipality is so hopelessly in debt that it does not matter what further obligations it assumes. You may put a mortgage on the Pantheon or on the Colosseum; but when you come to foreclose where will you find a buyer? You cannot mortgage the municipal income; for the simple reason that the outlay far exceeds it and there is not a further item left to be taxed. At the present moment Rome is being run, and run to ruin, by one Filippo Cremonesi, who is governor. He is popularly known as Pippo Pappa, a phrase of unsavory significance. I have already called attention in The Nation to some of his more glaring depredations. The wild scheme for the extension of the city was outlined by Mussolini in an outburst which he made at the Capitol on New Year's Eve when Pippo was being installed as governor of the city:

Rome must become the wonder of all the peoples of the earth. Vast, ordered, and powerful as it was in the days of the first empire of Augustus. Within five years the Pantheon and the Piazza Colonna will be connected by a great avenue. From the profane and parasitic structures surrounding them you will free the majestic temples of Christian Rome. The millenary monuments of our history must tower majestically in their becoming solitude. And then the third Rome will embrace other hills and will extend along the banks of the sacred stream even to the shores of the Mediterranean. A direct highway, which will be the longest and broadest in the world, will bring the surging force of Mare Nostrum from the resurrected Ostia to the heart of the city where the Unknown Hero watches.

Since the distance from Rome to Ostia is less than fifteen miles, it is difficult to see how the great highway thither can be "the longest in the world." But that is a typical example of the present madness. It is to encourage and propagate this folly that forty millions of good American dollars are now being sent across the Atlantic.

The people in Rome are taxed so heavily that life is fast becoming impossible for the middle and working classes. There is not a head of cabbage sold in marketplace or store that is not taxed—nor a potato, nor a pound of beans, nor a pair of boots, nor a suit of clothes. The visitor sees nothing of these burdens which the people have to bear. More than 48 per cent of the municipal taxes are levied on the necessities of life. Naturally the system hits the middle classes and the poor particularly; and I know civil servants who hitherto lived decent lives but who are now trying to exist on one meal a day and whose families are able to eat meat only once a week. That is what the present conditions in Rome are costing; and what will they cost when the people are called upon to pay for the new Roma Imperiale?

The point, however, to bear in mind is that not a penny of the loan in question will be spent in the reconstruction of Rome. There is no municipal council at present. The city is being managed by a dictator. The accounts are kept secret, so that there is no control. It will be an easy matter for the city to give guaranties; but the money will be passed over to the Fascist banks to pay back the huge advances that have been already made.

The Fascist papers (Gazzetta del Popolo, January 17, for instance) also inform us that there will be a loan of $20,000,000 for the Public Utility Credit Institute, which, though a state institution, is really controlled by the Banca Commerciale.² Of this twenty million, twelve are to be allocated to the Societa Idroelettrica Piemonte, generally known as the "S. I. P." This corporation includes several dependencies, most of which are engaged in constructing and managing hydro-electric power and lighting plants. The purpose of developing these plants now is to make Italy independent of foreign coal; so that she will be able to carry on wars without the cooperation of British or American or German coal miners. But, in my opinion, not a penny of the money will be spent in new plants. Its final destination will be the same as that of the money to be loaned to Rome. A mortgage on the property of the S. I. P. is to be granted; but of what use is that to the foreigner? The state does not guarantee the loan. The other eight millions of the twenty-million-dollar loan are to be spent in hydro-electric plants in central and southern Italy.

Another loan spoken of in the papers is that of $5,000,000 to the Turin Gas Corporation. This body controls several chemical factories which are now engaged in the manufacture of chemical products for use in modern high explosives. But here again it is inconceivable that the money will actually be spent on the concern, except in so far as it will be necessary to purchase raw materials

¹ A letter to investors from the Fifth Avenue office of the Guarantee Company of New York contains the following statements concerning economic conditions in Italy and the purposes for which the present loan will be used: "Since 1922 Italy's budgetary situation has shown steady improvement. For the year ended June 30, 1925, revenues exceeded expenditures by 209 million lire. . . . Recent official reports show an actual surplus of more than 200 million lire for the first six months of the current fiscal year. . . . The Government proposes to hold the entire amount of this loan as a gold reserve for currency stabilization purposes, and has resources and revenues available for all current requirements, both domestic and foreign. . . . In the light of these facts, the 7 per cent sinking fund gold bonds, due 1951, appear to be well secured and constitute an attractive investment. They are a direct obligation of the Italian Government."—EDITOR THE NATION.

² On February 26 New York newspapers carried advertisements of this $20,000,000 issue stating that mortgages on the various hydro-electric properties to be benefited by the loan will be used as security. The issue is offered by an American financial group including the Bankers Trust Company, Stone and Webster, Bonbright and Company, and others.—EDITOR THE NATION.

abroad. The banks will hold the money and will expend it according to their own ideas.

Though the Fascists think themselves clever folk, they make the childish mistake of underrating the intelligence of the foreigner when they are out to pick his pocket. They have already let it be known, for instance, that the stock of the S. I. P., of which I have already spoken, is to be put on sale on the New York market. Imagine it. The Americans are asked to lend the money and then they are asked to buy the stock which is supposed to be the collateral for the money they have loaned!

One direction in which the foreign loan is certain to be spent will be in the upkeep of the Fascist press and propaganda at home and abroad. Fascism is now faced with a deficit of half-a-million dollars each month in the support of its own press. There is no other press in Italy at the moment. When the Fascists take over a newspaper the public ceases to read it and it is for this reason that such a tremendous loss is incurred in the running of the government press. In France they are spending about four million francs a month in subsidizing the French press for the purpose of publishing articles favorable to Mussolini. I do not know how much is being spent in England for a like purpose. Huge sums are being laid out in the United States, in Germany, in Hungary, in Spain, and even in Greece. The Fascists have given material support to the Macedonian bandits. They gave guns and money to Tsankoff when he prepared his coup in Bulgaria and they are backing the Hungarian revolutionary reactionaries. Of this the Fascists themselves make no secret. At the last Assembly of the League of Nations one of the Fascist delegates, Signor Coppola, made the following statement (September 16, 1925):

The delegates of this Power (Hungary) do not seem to be sufficiently aware of the fact that their present conditions are not to be debited to the League but to the peace which followed the Great War. All wars end with terms that appear hard to those who have to submit to them; but these terms are not eternal. The vanquished have always risen up again when they have been worthy of it and when they have had the necessary moral force. Italy hopes that the Hungarians will have this force and for these reasons she was the first to lend a hand to Hungary.

At the last Assembly of the League of Nations (September, 1925) the Fascist delegation made no secret of the warlike intentions of Italy. They warmly canvassed the idea of annexing Austria to Italy. In order to prepare the way they have held out tempting baits to the industrialists of Styria, and Mussolini has shaken his fist across the prostrate body of South Tyrol. The present military program of the Fascists envisages a colonial war against Turkey.

To those who read the Italian press even casually it seems astonishing that people in America can be in any doubt as to the final destination of the money which they are now sending to Italy. It is for the purposes of war that this money will be spent; and the Fascist Government makes no secret of it. Let me draw attention to a few of its authoritative statements.

In Mussolini's own paper, Il Popolo d'Italia (December 1), the following was published on the occasion of the signing of the Locarno pact in London. The article is initialled "G. P." That is to say, it is from the hand of Deputy Polverelli, who is Mussolini's amanuensis and whose signature is recognized as the hallmark of what the Dictator has written:

This is not the first time [says the article] that a peace treaty has been concluded. After the Napoleonic wars the principal contracting parties swore eternal peace and friendship; but that did not prevent new wars from breaking out. Anyhow perpetual peace would be immoral and iniquitous. Let us realize in a matter-of-fact way that the Locarno pact meets a temporary necessity. When private purses and state exchequers have a new abundance of gold we shall again discuss the map of Europe.

In the Roman paper La Tribuna, which is now an official Fascist organ, the following appeared from the pen of Francesco Coppola on January 6. Coppola was Italian delegate to the League of Nations Assembly. He is the literary spokesman of Federzoni and the whole nationalist group.

If Italy does not wish to follow the course that fatally leads to ruin and slavery, she must possess herself of her own raw materials and her own lands for the purpose of colonization, it being understood that these will be outside of Europe, that is to say colonies: a colonial empire like France and England. The consciousness of this historic and unquestionable necessity makes up the true essence of Italian imperialism.

The same writer happens to be editor of the official nationalist review La Politica. In volume LXX of that review, published December 20, he was even more explicit about Italy's warlike intentions. Let it be remembered that what Coppola writes here is the belief of the people who have the Government of Italy in their hands today—the Fascist representatives of the industrialists and the bankers. Coppola reviews the question of "Italy's vital necessity"—the acquisition of colonies as an outlet for her excess population, especially in view of the bars against immigration set up by other nations. He continues:

In what direction then can Italy look for her industrial development and the means of supporting her too many children? It is true that Italian industry has been developing with a powerful urge; and, now that the post-war economic and social crisis has been overcome and that discipline and national energy have been restored, our industries are in full bloom. But the present state of affairs cannot cloak the vital reality. For it is well known that the present development of our industries is partly due to the devaluation of our money, and that is a condition of affairs which, for other reasons, we cannot wish or believe to be lasting. The industry of a country without raw materials has natural limits which are not very wide and which can be easily reached but not passed over. This is the national deficiency that is becoming burdensome. At the present moment France refuses to give us raw iron. Tomorrow, if she can establish with Germany a metallurgical trust on the Rhine, she will impose on us a monopolistic price for her iron. Profiting by the peace treaties, England had already imposed on us her monopolistic prices for coal. Moreover, the same England, together with the British Empire, the United States, and even conquered Germany, has practically closed its markets to our exportation with its new protectionist tariffs. From all this we have the fatal result of a serious disequilibrium in our commercial balance. We are actually forced to send an annual sum abroad of four milliards of lire for grain alone and two milliards for coal, not to count iron and the rest. And this disequilibrium, in its turn, gives the foreigner the opportunity of making these violent attacks on the lire, like that against which we had to defend ourselves last summer and which are destined perilously to depress our economic conditions so as to favor foreign competition and even the bringing of foreign political pressure to bear upon us. We are face to face with a true and proper economic servitude which cannot do otherwise than translate itself into a political servitude also. Now, in such conditions it would be dangerous to delude ourselves into thinking that Italian industry can go on developing in proportion to the increase in the population or to close our eyes to the threatening import of the consequences that will affect the political liberty of Italy. It is clear therefore that although a real unemployment phenomenon does not exist in Italy at the moment, we are running the risk of having within some years—and perhaps not many years—a formidable unemployment crisis with corresponding misery, which might have grave social consequences for Italy, in the first place, and also for Europe.

That is the great Italian problem which will not brook postponement. To it we must add that of our strategic freedom in the Mediterranean, which is a problem not less grave, and that of Italian nationality which in more than one point of the Mediterranean is in serious peril. But let us confine ourselves to the first and greatest problem. If she does not wish blindly to continue on the road to ruin and servitude, it is clear that Italy must lay hands on raw material which will be her own, and lands of her own for purposes of colonization, it being understood that this is to take place outside of Europe. It is not less clear that nobody is going to cede us these things gratuitously. Therefore, if we are not ready one day to perish, we shall be forced to seize them. And to seize them necessarily and in the first place means a modification of the present map of the Mediterranean and in general the extra-European imperial map. And this change must necessarily come through an act of force, even though that need not necessarily be directed against one of the great European Powers, which, it is to be hoped, will have the good sense not to place themselves blindly across the path of the irresistible and vital historic necessities of Italy.

All the italics in the quotations I have made from Coppola are his own. One might multiply examples of warlike pronouncements on the part of responsible leaders almost indefinitely. There is not a day that the Fascist papers are not teeming with them. A war must be entered on by the summer or autumn. That is an utter necessity for the Fascist regime. The regime arose out of extraordinary conditions and it cannot endure if Europe should return to a normal life of peace. Therefore it is necessary that the disturbed and abnormal conditions should continue. All the talk about getting colonies may be sincere enough from the nationalist point of view; but I know several Fascist leaders who are quite convinced that Italy will lose whatever war she engages in, simply because her soldiers will not fight for the maintenance of the present regime. Then disaster will be heaped upon disaster; but the Fascist gang will have made their pile and will clear out. To the bringing about of that eventuality the American money-lenders are cheerfully contributing today.

Free Speech in China

By HARRY F. WARD

THE Chinese attitude on free speech is different from that of the West. There it is not an abstract principle to be worshiped on state occasions but an ancient custom, an accepted way of adjusting things. Even family disputes are not infrequently composed on the street in a gathering of neighbors, by the help of the town-meeting method. Therefore in China one is spared that hypocritical phrase, "I believe in free speech, but—" Without any cant about it, the Chinese practice free speech as a method of working out the rule of reason in every function of life.

Nevertheless, China has its own limitations to free speech and, as in other spheres, Western methods are rapidly being adopted. The title of one of the lectures in a series to be given at one of the Chinese universities contained the word "communism." On this point an interview was requested by the administrator responsible for the course, in order that he might assure himself that the attitude of the lecturer would not arouse violent antagonism from the left-wing section of the students. He apologized for this necessity. "It is humiliating to me," he said, "because we are supposed to have absolutely free speech. But not long since in another part of the country a student who attacked communism in a college meeting was pulled from the platform and got killed in the fight that followed. We would not like to have any embarrassment with a foreign lecturer." At another university the professor who had interpreted the lecture remarked afterward, "Of course, you can say these things, but it is not so easy for us. A young lawyer who took up the cause of labor in this section three years ago was shot by the military governor and he said no more than you." In still another university the question of free speech came up with a faculty group. "Yes," they said, "there is free speech in China, but if you want to get home safely we would not advise you to go out on the street and make a speech against Dr. Sun Yat-sen [he had recently died] or to attack our local militarists in a public meeting."

China is notoriously a land of opposites. So along with a genuine democracy in the management of a great deal of life by discussion and agreement there has existed also arbitrary executive power. The exercise of this power in the repression of free speech has recently been accentuated by the rise of the militarists, with their foreign backers, also by the natural opposition of both these elements to the growing Chinese labor movement and to the propaganda of the Communists. The issue of free speech is thus joined in China in the most modern fashion. It first comes to a head in the universities. The issue of academic freedom is more than academic. University administrators are in politics in a more vital sense than with us. They are concerned with more than appropriations. They have a recognized responsibility for national policies, for the scholar has played an honorable part in Chinese government and the intellectuals are a political force to a degree unknown in the West.

Hence the academic world is much more exercised than it has been in the West by the discovery that the political authorities are beginning to practice espionage upon the professors. The head of a Chinese university told me how astonished he was recently, when visiting on official business a friend in the Government, to have his movements for the day recounted. "But I was particular," he said, "to notice that no one was following me." "Yes, but did you not see a peanut vendor at your gate?" "Yes, and I wondered why he was there all day, because I never eat peanuts." Yet that was a time-honored Oriental method of espionage. The numerous kinds of vendors on the streets of Chinese cities offer the authorities an easy means of securing information. It is less obvious, cheaper, and probably much more accurate than our clumsy under-cover system. Today in Peking there is a regular method of police reports on public meetings. It was introduced a few years since by some Chinese administrator who had studied in Japan.

The Chinese educators who organized the National University supposed that they had safeguarded academic freedom by making it a self-governing body, combining the best features of English and Continental universities. It has its own police force, and is responsible for the maintenance of order within its own grounds, where the government constabulary are not supposed to enter. Recently, however, its prerogatives have been encroached upon. The Minister of Education issued an edict requiring authorities of government universities to stop Communist organization meetings, on the basis of a police report that the librarian of the National University had held such a meeting. This was an admission that secret police had been operating on the campus. This invasion of university rights is part of a long struggle between the Ministry of Education and the National University over appropriations, and it involves numerous political complications. In the course of it the acting Minister of Education was rather roughly handled by an angry delegation of students. There ensued a police order which in itself evidences the Chinese sense of justice. Locating responsibility by implication, it forbade the teachers' union to meet to discuss politics, but permitted meetings to discuss salary arrears. A little later the Minister prohibited the students in Peking from parading on Humiliation Day, which commemorates the Twenty-one Demands of Japan. On that occasion his house was stormed and a student was killed. Behind all this is the basic antagonism of the nationalist section of the students toward the present Peking Government.

It is significant that no Chinese authority has attempted to suppress the students' union or interfere with its meetings. The union established its prestige and power at the time of the Japanese Twenty-one Demands and was really responsible for the defeat of that policy. Lately the students' strike has been used for all sorts of trivial purposes and educational authorities generally expect one just before examinations. Since the World War students' strikes have been accompanied by a good deal of rowdyism, and occasionally college administrators have been bombarded with ink-pots and other academic missiles or have been beaten in the course of an altercation with students. All such trivialities, however, have for the present disappeared before the cleansing force of the Shanghai incident, which has made the students' union again a power in the Nationalist movement. This incident was, at the bottom, a free-speech fight. Suffering mill workers had no way to express their grievances. Students who sympathized with them were likewise muzzled. They were forbidden by the law of the International Settlement, where thousands of them lived and studied, to parade, carry banners, or hold meetings. Permits for processions were granted only for funerals or weddings. They were refused on the great national holiday and at the time of the funeral of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, the students' hero. The atmosphere of repression, out of which came the shooting that will mark a turning-point of history, was well revealed by the speech of the prosecutor at the students' trial. This utterance was painfully familiar to those who had been in the United States in the days of Mitchell Palmer's brief glory. "The trouble," he said, "really started in a Bolshevist university." He would show the court that the case "was in fact pure bolshevism and nothing else." One of the documents to be offered was "a letter from a Bolshevist party in Germany." Such of the printed matter seized in the university as was put into evidence proved to be handbills and letters calling upon employees of the water-works and the electrical departments to strike; also urging chauffeurs, tramway men, ricksha coolies to join the strike. When foreign police and volunteers were sent out to remove such handbills and posters from the walls interesting complications occurred. In their ignorance of Chinese they tore down innocent advertisements, thus offending the Chinese merchants, whom the foreigners were anxious to conciliate; at the same time they left many of the offending posters untouched, because the students had cut the municipal seal from official proclamations and pasted it on their own.

At that particular time the Chinese residents of the International Settlement were reacting against another bit of attempted repression. Partly to defeat a proposed child-labor ordinance and partly from an inherent tendency, there was proposed a press law requiring the name and address of the printer on every piece of printed matter. The penalty for violation was about three times as big as that assessed against the child-labor law. Thus inevitably in China the link is being forged that in all other countries draws intellectuals who care for free speech into connection with the labor movement, for it is labor that gets repressed and it is in the labor struggle that the question of whether free speech lives or dies will be decided. It was the students' interest in the rights of labor that brought them into conflict with the authorities.

Theoretically, in China labor has the right to organize, although it is not specifically established in the law. That right is assumed under the clause of the constitution which proclaims, with some slight exceptions, liberty to call meetings and to organize societies. There is also another clause which specifically proclaims freedom of speech, press, and assemblage except as definitely limited by the law—and the limitations are immaterial. Thus while labor lacks specific legal recognition until China gets a labor code, it is in practice unmolested except and until the military authorities come under foreign influence. While the Chinese law does not recognize the right to strike or to incite to strike, there is an increasing record of successful strikes; and in Shanghai and Hankow student leadership has had not a little to do with it.

In the foreign settlements, of course, there is rigid repression of labor organization. So all meetings must be held and all printing done in the neighboring Chinese cities, and all distribution of printed matter and organizing must be carried on secretly. Also the foreign authorities are able to extend their policy of repression to officials of neighboring Chinese communities. In Chinese Canton, last Labor Day, celebration, of course, was free and untrammelled, both for right and left wings. But foreign Shanghai not only forbade parades in its own streets but persuaded the authorities of the Chinese city to do likewise.

Foreigners are also teaching the Chinese the technique of industrial espionage. A foreign railway official recently showed a friend of mine a picture album of men described by him as Chinese labor agitators, who, he said, "have recently come back to this section." Later he informed my friend that three of them were safely in jail and it was noticeable that during the strike in that city the police picked those who were arrested with evident discrimination.

Labor leaders in China take a risk of more than a jail sentence. When Wu Pei-fu was previously in power in Central China there was a railroad strike at Hankow. Some forty men came down from Peking to assist. Outside the city the train was stopped and these men were taken out and shot, without trial. The lawyer who was the real leader of the strikers had before this been arrested and shot after what was nothing more than a drumhead court martial. He had previously been active in organizing and leading to a successful conclusion a strike of another set of workers, and in foreign circles—where the governor's action was highly approved, and from which it was in some degree incited—all that was ever alleged against him was his labor activities, with the usual supplement, that he made money out of it. When the recent national strike broke the leading English paper of that section printed a cut of the grave of this man, with its headstone carrying in Chinese its inscription concerning the reason for his death. Over it was a headline warning other strike leaders. Later the same paper vociferously commended the strong action taken by the Chinese authorities against strike leaders, quoting orders to shoot without hesitation any workers who became obstreperous and to shoot on sight three men known by name to the Chinese authorities who were described as paid Bolshevik agents and the real inciters of the strike. This order, the paper went on to say, would do more to get men back to work than long and windy arguments. This is the sort of thing that many foreigners mean by a "strong, stable government."

The student movement is increasingly conscious of the risks it is taking in joining with labor in the demand for free speech. It is increasingly aware that the issue has to be fought out on the economic field. The students are also learning that they are dealing with a world-wide movement, and the influences which are at work elsewhere in the world to repress freedom can be counted upon to complete their education.

Cooking Without a Cookbook

By MARGARETE MUNSTERBERG

COOKING is not a science, but an art. And an art is acquired by long practice, rather than learned. For all learning is at bottom theoretical—even if it is learning how to scrub floors. After learning you "know how," but after practice the knowing is turned into doing, eventually into habitual doing or instinctive skill.

Theoretical training as a starting-point, however, should not be disparaged. On the contrary, no amount of learning can hinder an art. Philology is excellent training for a poet, though no amount even of grammar and rhetoric will make him one. Cookbooks, which are the textbooks of theoretical courses in cookery, are necessary for acquiring a foundation and are also useful in providing stimulus. But the test of inspiration will always be the desire to cook without a cookbook. In making this statement, I must except the field of baking. Baking is in every case an exact science, governed by the laws of chemical combination. Not until the cake has been taken out of the oven and has become a subject for frosting and decoration may science be left behind and imagination unfold its wings.

In the art of cookery, as in those arts generally designated as "higher," there is the creative urge. Anyone who really likes to cook has felt it. The other day at the fish market I was hesitating between a fish to broil and a piece of salmon to boil. Though the superiority of fish broiled in its own briny juice was obvious, I could not resist a vision of a salmon deluged in a smooth, delicately seasoned sauce with finely chopped egg sprinkled over it. I took the salmon for the sake of realizing the vision, as the creative urge was upon me.

The test of cooking is, after all, the sauce. Critical foreign visitors to our shores have a saying that in America you find many kinds of meat and one sauce, whereas in France you find one kind of meat and many sauces. This reflects on American cookery. For the variety of meat depends on the purchasing power of the householder, but the variety of sauces depends on the genius of the cook.

And, in contrast to the sentiment of the poet who said: "I am the spendthrift spirit of poesy!" the more art there is in the concoction of sauces, the more economical the process. This is true only, of course, within the limits of normal conditions, when there is no scarcity of the fundamentals such as butter, eggs, and milk. But ordinarily the inventive talent leads to economy. A ragout, with its pungent or stealthy flavors, made of some humble cut of beef or of remnants from the roasts of yesterdays is more distinguished and at the same time less costly than a new roast or steak. Yet a ragout of remnants must not appear "made over," any more than a last season's dress altered into a modish gown should betray its age.

Such a metamorphosis as a left-over roast reappearing as a ragout is by no means a "camouflage." It does not pretend to be anything that it is not, for it is an altogether new creation. And, if the cook is really inspired, it may even represent a higher stage in the process of transmigration.

Yet inspiration and skill are not the portion of everybody. With the materials given, the great point is how to use them. We remember the pipe to which Hamlet likens himself.

HAMLET: 'Tis as easy as lying; govern these vantages with your fingers and thumb, give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music. Look you, these are the stops.

GUILDENSTERN: But these cannot I command to any utterance of harmony; I have not the skill.

A poet of my acquaintance was teased because he used a rhyming dictionary. "You take my rhyming dictionary," he said in return. "and see if you can write my poetry." Thus the inspired cook may challenge you to use her cookbook and see if you can make the same ragout.

Sometimes the effectiveness of a dish is due not so much to culinary skill as to some happy trick of satisfying four out of five senses and at the same time stimulating the imagination. I remember a family whose domestic peace was for a time almost wrecked by "peaches with cream." The father of the family, on his return from a business trip to New York, many years ago, talked with enthusiasm about an excellent new dessert that he had enjoyed in a hotel which is now no more. This dish consisted of sliced peaches with heavy unwhipped cream poured over them and was called "peaches with cream." Thereupon the wife burst into tears and declared that he had had the very same thing at home any number of times and had never deigned to notice it. This ingratitude became a sore topic in the family and the very mention of "peaches with cream" was like a red cape to the bull. The case was simply one of the imagination suddenly stimulated.

Every art, even the highest, reaches its goal through the senses; therefore all arts have something in common. For that reason it is not presumptuous to draw a parallel between the art of cooking and the art of literature which has its threefold expression—the epic, the dramatic, and the lyric. There is also epic, dramatic, and lyric cooking.

Those who are by nature epic cooks—that is, those who enjoy the long, leisurely process and like to see a smooth creation slowly emerge out of chaos—will turn preferably to baking and to the making of pies and pastries. They have long patience and will give painstaking devotion to their task and will slowly roll out a pie crust, like a tale that is told. Their labor is the proverbial one-tenth inspiration and nine-tenths perspiration, but the fruits of their labor are comparatively lasting.

Those who have the dramatic vein, on the other hand, delight in tense situations and hair-breadth escapes. The dramatic cook is in her element as she deftly makes a pancake leap, as she controls the omelet that almost burns, the cheese soufflé that almost drops, the sizzling bacon that must be steered between the Scylla of the underdone English style and the Charybdis of a black cinder.

Finally there are the lyric cooks, those who find expression for their inmost and quite individual sense of fitness and taste in the concoction of soups and sauces. One drop more or less of the oil of gladness may perfect a salad dressing. Seasoning and spice, extracts of vanilla and the quintessential juices of fruits are to the culinary lyricist what words are to the poet—means of conveying the most delicate shades of expression.

To the truly individual cook the nameless sauce will be a more stimulating creation than one labeled with a high-sounding French name and prescribed by the cook-book. And even as a poet can create a gem out of apparent trifles, so the lyric cook does not hesitate to make soups and sauces with almost nothing as foundation—water in which spinach or cauliflower has been boiled, the juice of fish or fowl, which undergo the alchemy of good cooking.

The story is well known of the poet Heine who compared his art to that of a fashionable tailor whose custom it was to make no charges at all for the material, considering only his inimitable makemanship worthy of compensation. So the poet considered the mere material of his priceless songs as worthless or indifferent. In the same way, by one who has the lyric gift of cooking, the most indifferent or apparently worthless substance may be turned into a concoction of great charm.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter frequently feels lonely. His associates entertain such positive views on the social flux which we call civilization. They will diagnose for him a world disease and present a cure any hour in the day—so omniscient is their knowledge, so confident their logic. The Drifter has never been able to convince himself that his own thinking on world, or even national, problems possessed much value. He always suspects it as the offspring of his own prejudices and prepossessions. He takes refuge, therefore, behind the doubt of a true historian. Skepticism is his constant attitude of mind. His associates on the other hand seem to agree with a certain friend of the feminine gender who, becoming exasperated with the Drifter's continuous questionings of her beliefs, exclaimed: "Well, I am glad I am not historically minded, for I want to know something definite, even if it isn't true."

* * * * *

THE state of perpetual doubt in which the Drifter dwells saves him from mental perturbation. When all around him are overpowered by hysteria he is able to maintain a calm which gives him a sense of superiority very comforting to his amour propre. All America rushes frantically into the war mania, fearful lest the Hunnish minions of Satan may lord it over the world. The Drifter is unaffected; the historian in him is uppermost; and he does not know which outcome will bring the world nearest the millennium, the triumph of the Allies or the victory of the Germans. He does not expect much good will result in either event. He wonders whether his own country is not making a portentous mistake in taking a part in the struggle.

* * * * *

HISTORICAL-MINDEDNESS has made it possible for the Drifter to hear with serenity the succession of after-war evils about which the editors of his favorite weekly grow so disturbed. Like them, he disapproves of intolerance and illiberality, but his knowledge of history has accustomed him to these phenomena. So he cultivates his flowers instead of his passions when he hears of the persecution of the Reds, the curbing of free speech, the atrocities of the Ku Klux Klan, and other encroachments upon the rights of free Americans.

* * * * *

SELDOM does the Drifter meet people with the true historical mind, not even when he seeks those circles where students of the past congregate. They, too, harbor certitudes, they, too, have their pet verities. He finds few with whom he can hold an amiable conversation. Take the subject of Cal Coolidge. Radicals can get together and have an hilarious jamboree at the expense of the Inarticulate One. Democrats can easily find other Democrats to bemoan the perversion of public opinion, while Republicans cannot walk abroad without stumbling against someone with whom to rejoice over the presence in the White House of the stalwart champion of righteousness, economy, and big business. In all these crowds the Drifter finds himself ill at ease. Other viewpoints than these orthodox ones occur to him. Is it not possible that for a democracy there is in silent Cal the same value that David Harum discovered in fleas for a dog? Who can tell?

Correspondence

From the Strike Field

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This is to express my appreciation of your courtesy in publishing a note from me with regard to the situation among the miners in the anthracite strike region. That note mentioned Mrs. Jacob Waring, of Plymouth, Pennsylvania, as one to whom contributions of money or clothes might be sent for relief of people in want in this section.

The effectiveness of this appeal is a proof of the character of the clientele of The Nation. As a result of that one note, Mrs. Waring received more than $40 in money and something like forty parcels of clothing. Contributions came from as far south as Richmond and from as far west as San Francisco.

Mrs. Waring and a number of other workers in this section have expressed to me very earnestly their appreciation of what you and your subscribers have done for them. If you could see some of the half-clothed children in these mining towns, you would be glad to have had the privilege of cooperating in this work. Though the strike is now at an end, we should bear in mind that the men will not draw any pay before March 15. Any further contributions will be appreciated and put to good use.

WILLIAM E. BOHN

A Warning to Capitalists

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. J. M. Keynes, in his first article Am I a Liberal?, published October 10, 1925, in The Nation and the Athenaeum, says:

The difficulty is that the capitalist leaders . . . are incapable of distinguishing novel measures for safe-guarding capitalism from what they call bolshevism. If old-fashioned capitalism was intellectually capable of defending itself, it would not be dislodged for many generations. But, fortunately for Socialists, there is little chance of this.

He adds:

This (the Labor) party can only flourish in an atmosphere of social oppression or as a reaction against the Rule of Die-Hard.

All of which is not far from saying that the radical coins the slogans which the conservative suggests to him. Like all generalizations, this is probably unfair to both. But making every allowance for the capitalist's capacity in his immediate field of action, is it not true that he shows an amazing inaptitude for adaptation to fundamental political principles?

Dr. Moritz J. Bonn, in one of his recent articles, reprinted in the Living Age for February 13, 1926, speaks of "the inseparably connected problems of protecting the minority from the oppression of the majority, and protecting the majority from being throttled by a militant minority." He continues: "A profound conflict has arisen between political and economic power. While political authority has drifted into the hands of the masses, economic authority has become the possession of a few individuals."

Again, this may be going too far if applied to our country. Our militant minority is by no means always capitalistic; and economic authority can hardly be said to be in the possession of a few individuals. But the main propositions are not overdrawn. The conflict between economic and political power is on; and the capitalist appears to be as apt in the use of one as he is unprepared in the employment of the other.

Economic readjustments to fit political demands have to enter over his dead body, so to speak. He rarely anticipates by suggesting rational relief; but invites the radical penalty by resisting to the last. If he alone had to bear the penalty, it would be amusing; but since his loss is shared by all, it is tragic. He complains of overlegislation, but welcomes the cloture and denounces Senators who obstruct new legislation. He applauds our refusal to recognize Russia, and complacently contemplates the exclusion of the Countess Karolyi; but under the plea that Italians should be privileged to choose their form of government he indorses the debt settlement with a dictator who issues war threats right and left; and he lends approving ear to the propaganda of Mussolini delegates in our midst. Government ownership is regarded as a challenge to the principle of private property; but no protest is heard against the taking and holding of German private property as a pledge for the war debts of a defunct German government.

Coolidge Relief Fund

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Now that the politicians of the Senate have rejected for a second time the nomination of Thomas F. Woodlock to the Interstate Commerce Commission a situation has arisen which the patriots of the United States cannot ignore. Mr. Woodlock has been serving his country devotedly for more than ten months, under a recess appointment after his name was rejected in March of last year. Under the law he could draw no pay without confirmation; and this painful situation must prey upon the conscience of the President, who insisted that he serve. I do not doubt that Mr. Coolidge is planning at this very moment to pay Mr. Woodlock out of his own pocket, since an ungrateful people is shirking its obligation. Commerce commissioners get $12,000 a year, and the sum due Mr. Woodlock is only a little more than ten thousand. Herewith I am inclosing one dollar, as the nucleus of a fund to reimburse and reward him, and I urge that The Nation act as custodian. Senator Underwood, the only Democrat who voted for confirmation, will surely act as chairman of a committee to collect money in the Senate. It would be well, as a rebuke to those who charge that Mr. Woodlock speaks for Wall Street and the railroads, to limit the amount of an individual subscription to a dollar, and to forbid any corporation gift.

The Kropotkin Memorial

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In England a group of friends and admirers of Peter Kropotkin have started a fund for the commemoration of his services in the cause of human progress and in admiration for his life of sacrifice to noble ideals based on mutual aid, morality, and equality.

In 1917 after forty-one years of exile he and his wife returned to Russia, hoping to find it a land of freedom. In their haste to return he left behind him his large and valuable library of books and papers, containing a history of the ethical struggle for human liberty in which he had taken so large a part. These we have been able to transport to the old home in Moscow where he was born, now transformed into a Peter Kropotkin Museum and Library, and where his widow, Sophie Kropotkin, lives and works.

Peter Kropotkin died in 1921, finishing on his deathbed the volume on Ethics which has been published in English.

More financial help, however, is needed than England in her present impoverished condition can give, and I appeal for the support of Sophie Kropotkin and her work to our friends in the United States of America and ask them to cooperate in the Peter Kropotkin Memorial Fund, for which I am acting as treasurer. All checks should be addressed to Mrs. Cobden-Sanderson, Hull House, 800 South Halsted Street, Chicago.

Books and Plays

I Shall Know

By EDA LOU WALTON

Even as I took you now I let you go,
Smiling a little in your eyes and quiet,
With no harsh gesture even to let you know
Continence in my love, or to deny it;
I give you back no vows, for vows to you
Are only as each wind is to the sea:
Something to move a passionate waste anew
Toward horizons bending fulgently.
Always, a little wondering, you'll remember
My dove-like hands wing-folded as you went,
My quiet eyes wherein no single ember
Of agony gave point to your intent;
And I, well I shall know what you can never
Be sure of, and much else besides forever.

Trotsky on Great Britain

Whither England? By Leon Trotsky. International Publishers. $1.75.

TROTSKY is a pamphleteer not an historian, a devotee of theories not a slave to facts. In this lively little book, so delightfully sprightly that its most wicked darts will cause no annoyance to those at whom they are flung, no one will find the truth either about Agadir or Black Friday, the British Communists or the Labor Ministry. An Oriental riot of fancy regarding facts and events and an impish delight in impudence and expletives, combined with a resourceful art in swash-buckling and a shrewd dialectic, make the book always entertaining and sometimes serious.

His thesis is that England, no longer the economic mistress of the world, is going down to decay through political and economic distress, and that everyone who places any social value in the Christian faith or in evolutionary processes controlled by reason and right is an enemy of mankind—especially of the British working classes. He sees no hope for anyone except through revolution, and where he has to admit reluctantly that the Russian Revolution has not been so successful as it might have been, he explains that that was owing to the backwardness of the country. The truth is that only the backwardness of the country allowed the Bolshevik Revolution. A nation organized industrially as ours is, with a society leaning at every point on international trade and contact, would be lying dead at the dyke side after a year of a Soviet administration and a Cheka. Russia alone of European nations, because of its backwardness and the surrender of its government to the peasants, could show some years of Bolshevik rule.

The substantial part of the book is a study of force as the means of social change, and in this Trotsky returns again and again to two tunes. One he plays with a jazz gleefulness. "We do not believe in force," the British Independent Labor Party has said, and Trotsky with many playful variations and much impertinent comment reminds it of the policeman and of previous revolutions (which he admits did little but rivet on the nation the tyranny of the victors). The I. L. P., however, is perfectly right in rejecting the doctrine of force. It may be, as Trotsky dogmatizes, that when we have a Labor majority carrying out in Parliament a Labor program the classes that are assailed will fight. That is an interesting subject for prophetic speculation, and whoever begins with the assumption that the British Tory Party is peculiarly devoid of respect for any law and order but its own, and is not likely to show any obedience to constitutional methods except those it manipulates, may not be far wrong. The Bolshevik and the British Tory may be found to belong to the same political family. That, however, has been discussed in Labor Party literature and finds a place in Labor Party considerations, and regarding it Trotsky has nothing to warn nor to teach us. But it is beside the mark. Unblushingly and unapologetically the Labor Party rejects revolution as the way of salvation, believes in political action, and in the event of coming into power will protect that action against either the plots of Communists or the mutinies of Tories.

The other tune, played in more sober tempo, is that the evolutionary process is marked by moments of sudden outward change, and that the years of "gradualness" are only valuable in so far as they accumulate power to effect that change. Here again Trotsky is only reiterating what British Socialists have been saying and writing for over a quarter of a century. The rise of the Labor Party to being the second party in the state is a case in point; when it is enabled to give form in the state to its constructive proposals, that will be the revolution. Russian apologists are curiously blind on this point, and one of the blindest is Trotsky himself—when he is not incurring the suspicion of his colleagues for seeing their follies. They think that resolutions, manifestos, speeches, words, imprisonment, the suppression of liberty to write and speak, the subordination by their Red Army of peoples like the Georgians make up the revolution. There they are mistaken. They may yet effect their revolution, however, and I wish they would. They have so modified their policy that they encourage us to hope that they will succeed, though every new Trotsky pamphlet shows how far they have yet to go. We did our best to help them on to right ways in London, and if they were ungrateful and continued to fulminate their vain nonsense from Moscow, we did not trouble much. We were interested in the restoration of Russia and its return, under any government it cared to tolerate, to the cooperation of European nations. Trotsky's exposition of revolution within the evolutionary process indeed cuts the ground from under his feet as a politician, at the same time that it contributes to his vim as a pamphleteer.

"Whither England?" must indeed be read as an indication of the chagrin of Bolshevik leaders against the "stupid" British working classes. For years they have supplied their tools here with money and instructions. They have not been good tools, but they have been active ones. Under our prejudices in favor of liberty they have had plenty of rope. We have not adopted the policy of imprisonment or suppression (until the present Government, to advance its own political interests far more than to protect their country, put a dozen of them in the dock). We knew our people better than that. Even when every newspaper in the country was predicting the downfall of the Moderates (as some of us are called), when the press of the world was summoned to Liverpool last September to record the triumph of the Left (as others are called), and when Moscow was awaiting the glad tidings that its money had at long last borne fruit, the Labor Party Conference inflicted upon them a defeat more humiliating than they had received at the hands of the working classes of any country in the world.

Great Britain is facing tremendous difficulties—imperial, economic, social; the old times have, indeed, gone; rivals surround us on sea and land, in east and west; the relations between capital and labor have been such as to destroy confidence and good-will, and the system of capitalism has almost swept away the pride and moral obligation in industry. Against this we have the hard and furious reaction of revolution which, were there any hope of a dawn in it, would soon come upon us. No humane man would then lift up his little finger to stave it off. But it has no such hope. The Labor movement here strives to strengthen the other reaction of social constructive transformation by the only power that we know giving prospects of success—political power used to effect economic change, to establish control over the industrial life of the nation, and to protect and promote communal well-being in a cooperative state.

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD

Plastic Form

The Art in Painting. By A. C. Barnes. Merion, Pennsylvania: Barnes Foundation Press. $6.

THE Museum of the Barnes Foundation at Merion, Pennsylvania, contains what is perhaps the richest collection of modern painting in the world, and in the present book the president of the foundation sets forth the critical organum which he has employed in his study of art. His purpose is to reduce to order the vague chaos of modern aesthetic theory by the introduction of rational analysis; the result is to provide not merely a collection of critical appreciations but a more or less systematized method for the study of the aims and accomplishments of painters. Dissatisfied with such elusive terms as Bell's "Significant Form" and Berenson's "Tactile Values," he considers in order the various sources of satisfaction in painting, discusses their relative importance, and then in a series of comparative analyses indicates the means by which different painters have secured their effects.

Between the pseudo-classical theory that art is imitation and that extreme of the modern reaction which maintains that subject matter is totally irrelevant to painting Mr. Barnes establishes a via media by means of psychology. It is, so he says in effect, the business of the artist to represent his most fruitful reaction to the real world, but that most fruitful reaction is not his perception but his apperception, not those data which he receives in common with all who have eyes but that personal arrangement which is the result of his temperament and which constitutes his original vision. And in the case of a painter this personal vision is a vision of form or relationship which can be expressed by plastic means, by, that is to say, the arrangement of line, color, or mass in such a manner as to constitute a creative modification of reality whether the form created be chiefly a matter of two-dimensional line pattern as in the case of Botticelli, chiefly a matter of the relationships of forms in space as is usually the case of Leonardo, or, as in the case of Renoir, a more complicated series of relationships which employ line, perspective, and color for their representation. Subject matter is not entirely irrelevant, since two pictures like Titian's "Entombment" and one of Cézanne's still lifes in the Barnes Foundation may present fundamentally the same pattern without producing identical aesthetic effects. The bastard element of illustration appears only when the thing which the painter is attempting to express is not expressed by plastic means; when, for example, the subject is mother love and the picture depends for its effect upon mental associations connected with the situation presented rather than with the forms which the painter creates. Thus Giotto is a greater religious painter than Raphael, because in the case of the latter there is nothing religious about the pictures except the story which they illustrate, while in the case of the former there is a mystical element in the nature of the forms created which would be perceived by one totally ignorant of the story from which the subject is taken.

Mr. Barnes's method has the enormous advantage of being almost exclusively the result of induction, and his treatment of the development of tradition is particularly illuminating, especially in so far as it deals with the relationship existing between modern and old masters. The element of distortion which plays so large a part in modern painting and which proves a stumbling-block to so many people of conventional taste or academic training is not, he maintains, a new thing, and he illustrates how primitive, Oriental, and Renaissance painters all achieved effects which would not be possible except for the departures which they made from literal representation. And he does, I think, prove his point abundantly, although he never makes the distinction, not perhaps very important but nevertheless interesting, between those painters who have made an artistic use of, let us say, a deficient knowledge of perspective and those who, fully masters of that knowledge, have deliberately discarded it for artistic purposes. There is no doubt, for example, that the color patterns of certain Persian paintings would be completely destroyed if the perspective were rectified, and much the same thing could be said of many Italian primitives painted by men who had not yet attained a certain technical skill which they and their contemporaries were certainly struggling to attain. There can, on the other hand, be little doubt that, as Mr. Barnes points out, Uccello consciously introduced faulty perspective and a certain stiffness of drawing for the sake of a predetermined effect, and that in so doing he was working upon exactly the same principle which leads many modern painters to sacrifice "correct" drawing or coloring to form. Aesthetically it is perhaps of little importance to make the distinction between those artists who achieved their effects in spite of limited knowledge and those who deliberately disregarded knowledge which they had; but a further investigation of the facts would, I believe, throw some light upon the question of the artist's consciousness of his own aims. The very painters who so cunningly utilized distortion were often, I suspect, quite unaware in their conscious minds that imitation was not always desirable, being eager to advance the knowledge which probably proved definitely harmful to the tradition of Renaissance painting.

Though I have no more than an amateur's interest in painting and should, perhaps, confess to less than an amateur's knowledge of the subject, Mr. Barnes's book seems to me, as one interested in the methods of criticism in general, a distinct and important contribution. Since the criticism of painting involves the discussion of one art in terms appropriate to another, it is particularly likely to become either a vague hocus-pocus or to remain so completely subjective as to be no more than an account of personal reactions which may be conditioned by many factors independent of the work itself. Mr. Barnes furnishes a method of approach in consequence of which one may talk about a picture and be sure that one is, indeed, talking about the picture and not about archaeology, literature, the physics or physiology of vision, or merely vague impressionistic reactions.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Ready-Made Man

Behaviorism. By John Watson. Peoples Institute Publishing Company. $3.

Psychology for Child-Training. By Arland D. Weeks. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

MR. WATSON'S volume of popular lectures, being the work of a belligerent behaviorist, starts with a barrage fire against other systems. Thus psychoanalysis is declared to be mere "junk," and the concept of instincts is said no longer to be needed in psychology. James was an introverted philosopher and not a scientist. As for habits, most psychologists like Thorndike believe that habit formation is "implanted by kind fairies." Personalities like these have made the Watsonian variety of behaviorism somewhat unpopular. Academic circles are not prize rings where the critic talks to his opponent as Dempsey does to his. However, in addition to these particular remarks the lecturer offers some knockout generalizations. Up to the advent of behaviorism the mental sciences were stewing in their own juices. But now, we are informed, introspective and functional psychology shows a leaning toward behaviorism, philosophy is gradually disappearing and becoming the history of science, sociology is merging into behavioristic social psychology, and religion is being replaced among the educated by experimental ethics. In short, the behaviorist can safely throw out this real challenge to the subjective psychologists: "Prove that philosophy and the social sciences based upon your speculations have any right to further take up the time and thought of developing students."

So much for the first lecture in this popular series. The next three are taken up with analyzing psychological problems under conditioned reflex methods, with stimulus substitutions in glandular reaction, and with a description of the human body—what it is made of, how it is put together, and how it works. Except for a description of the endocrine glands in their everyday behavior these lectures on physiology, with their crude cuts, are little in advance of the seventeenth-century doctrine of “man a machine.” With the fifth lecture more modern topics are taken up. The soul being obsolete, and consciousness being merely an intangible something, it is concluded that there is no such thing as the inheritance of so-called “mental” traits. Here Mr. Watson flings another challenge: “Give me a dozen healthy infants, well-formed, and my own specified world to bring them up in, and I’ll guarantee to take any one at random and train him to become any type of specialist I might select—into a doctor, lawyer, artist, merchant, chief, and, yes, even into beggar-man and thief, regardless of his talents, penchants, tendencies, abilities, vocations, and race of his ancestors.”

The last Eugenics Congress might have something to say to this. If it be true, time has been wasted on the studies of delinquent and deficient families from the Jukes to the Kallikaks. But, continues Mr. Watson, emotional reactions are not hereditary, and there is no hereditary pattern of fear, rage, shame, and the like. No, fear and other responses are always conditioned. Environment is everything. According to their surroundings the two Smith boys will develop respectively into a captain of industry and a lounge lizard. Certain curious conclusions follow from all this. If eugenics is nothing and euthenics everything, the behaviorist may well ask whether many of our prescribed courses of conduct make for the adjustment of the individual or the contrary—such, for example, as having a family life or even knowing our own fathers and mothers.

Mr. Watson refers to his group as “we hardy souls.” They might better be called the behaviorist R. U. R.’s. Carel Capek portrayed machine-made men who behaved as they did because they were made so to behave. In like manner the American iconoclast would substitute the laboratory for the home, because the latter leads to wrong emotional conditioning of children. For instance, in the home children are crying morning, noon, and night. Why? Because there are certain situations which make the child cry, from having the face washed to having the nose wiped. Substitute for these situations those which make the child laugh, from teasing other children to “making sounds more or less musical, at the piano, with a mouth organ, singing and pounding.” This substitute for the home sounds quite home-like, and Mr. Watson’s conclusion hardly seems to follow that the laboratory is the best environment for “unconditioning” children. The same holds true for another behavioristic Utopia. This is the doctrine that the socially untrained should be restrained and made to earn their daily bread by sixteen hours of work a day in vast manufacturing and agricultural institutions, escape from which is impossible. Again this reminds us of the Robots, the mechanical workmen of Capek; for conditioned reflexes are now to be turned over to the physiologist or to the physiological chemist for solution. The upshot of the whole matter is that man becomes an assembled organic machine ready to run. But in this conclusion the behaviorist has never met the query of the philosopher Montague as to “implication.” Man, like a motor car, can be described in terms of the total running parts. But what is the implication, the meaning of the action? The jitney may be going for a joy-ride or the doctor. Does it, the machine, know the meaning, the implication, the aim of its action?

Mr. Weeks contributes a rather dreary little book from North Dakota. It is not above the mental horizon of the high-school student of the plains and offers an easy first course in pedagogy. There is nothing remarkable about the book except its style. That is strange. Talking of “travel interest,” the author says:

A “moral substitute for war” would need to include travel experience in place of that which war provides. The response which the young make to a prospect of war, declared for no matter what ostensible ends, is one consisting of a high percentage of going somewhere. The Crusades relieved the immense boredom at the onset of a sedentary civilization. If or when there is “law, not war,” something may have to be done to provide outings having the whoopingly gratifying aspects of going uninvited into foreign territory.

Despite its peculiar diction the book has some rather interesting questionnaires at the ends of its chapters. Answers to similar questions are elsewhere given, and they offer a rich mine of curious information as to what might be called the mind of Main Street.

WOODBIDGE RILEY

A Modern Confession

No More Parades. By Ford Madox Ford. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

ROUSSEAU quarreled with his time because it would not let him express himself in his own fluid and volcanic terms. He won his fight. Confession, confined in its politest form to the salon, in its most brutal form to the bar and brothel, in its most revelatory form to the Catholic grating, became, in the course of time, an established literary convention. The romantic novel was born—but terrific were the labor pains. Rousseau, Byron, Werther, Musset, Leopardi were all in their day viewed askance. The crimson-vested yawpers who sat, yelling, astride their several perpendicular pronouns were stoned and derided, pronounced diseased, cried down as perverse. They were all crying aloud in a classic wilderness. They were the first to hang up for display their inhibitions, to capitalize the barbarisms of emotion.

In the beginning this was a trying and difficult business. In their furious attempts to break through the reinforced walls of moral and artistic restraint the early romantics developed full-size complexes—Byronic narcissism, Wertherian suicidal melancholia, and Leopardian sentimental pessimism. The air of Europe was saturated with neuroses. But gradually the confessional impulse organized for its expression beautiful and easy forms of its own—the autobiographical novel, the nineteenth-century lyric, the familiar essay. Romanticism, like vaccination, took; the audience became habituated to it; the romantics themselves ceased to be astonished at the vehemences of their own souls. Byron faded into Oscar Wilde.

Today, in obedience to the eternal art cycle, we are confronted with a new and fascinating literary phenomenon. We are all romantics now, but we may not show it. If you are Stephen Dedalus, intellectualize your emotions; analyze them, scorn them, mock them—but do not flaunt them. Jean-Jacques writhes in misery because he wishes to show his whole soul to the populace, and, of course, cannot. Christopher Tietjens, the hero of “No More Parades,” writhes because he does not wish to show his soul to the rabble—and perforce he must. No More Parades! is his cry—but it is a cry. And there are other cries wrung from him. The malady, the horror of the war upsets his Tory stoicism. The deep reticence of aristocracy bids him sternly keep his form; but amid the febrile waste and misery of a base-camp behind the lines how shall he keep it? In a world of lurid, sometimes pathetically comic melodrama, how shall he preserve the integrity, the silence of his soul? Obviously this is the inverse of Rousseau’s problem. The pendulum has swung.

“No More Parades” is thus extremely interesting to the diagnostician of literary trends. It does not, perhaps, deserve on any other grounds the excessive praise that has been heaped upon it. Its war pictures, while vivid and useful as propaganda (pace the Flaubertian Mr. Ford!), are essentially in the Barbusse-Latzko tradition; the use of interior monologue and subconscious conversation is skilful, but not, like that of Joyce, electrical; and while its purely epithetical vigor is often magnificent, the language as a whole is swollen. The book has moments of intensity; but they are, after all, and noticeably, moments. Its energy is discontinuous, sporadic; its heralded "indignation" is at times a noble cry, but just as often a frothy splutter. Mr. Ford has created in Tietjens an involved and subtle character, but the art-fabric in which he lives and moves is broken and uneven. The author's intelligence is as searching as lightning—but there is no unity in lightning. It is spectacular, but not permanently illuminating.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

A Theory of Language

Geist und Kultur in der Sprache. Von Karl Vossler. Heidelberg: Carl Winter's Universitätsbuchhandlung.

THIS volume of miscellaneous essays on what may be called the philosophy of language by the well-known Romanist of the University of Munich is held together by the consideration of linguistic processes in their relation to other mental activities. It deals successively with language as a product of social intercourse, of personal inner experience, of religious inspiration and cult, of custom and usage, of national instinct, of groups of special interests, occupations, and professions, of science, and of poetry. All of these discussions are distinguished by penetration and lucidity of thought and enlivened by a wealth of illustrative facts. Their tendency may be summed up by the author's own words: "What we combat is the division of labor, all too long practiced, according to which the philosopher was to take care of the thinking, the empiricist of the collecting of material and the so-called knowing. Through it there have been heaped up, on the one hand, so many shadowy and empty ideas, on the other, so many 'solid,' i.e., dry, facts, that it is time by pulling down the partition-wall to see both ideas and facts in a new light." The chapter on New Forms of Thought in Vulgar Latin is a particularly enlightening example of the fruitfulness of Professor Vossler's method. The dedication of the book to Professor J. E. Spingarn is a well-merited acknowledgment of the services of this American pioneer in the comparative study of literature.

KUNO FRANCKE

Labor Economics

Labor Economics. By Solomon Blum. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

OUR eighth lively art is research. It's cheap, and gets cheaper with every commencement. Our annual output of fact-findings (in which the same facts often lead to different findings) no doubt stacks up pretty well with our overwhelming preponderance of autos and phones, as against the rest of the world. But in few fields has the art developed so rapidly since the war as in labor, whose spiritual deflation seems to stand in some sort of inverse ratio to its intellectual fashionableness. The result is inevitable. In this mania for fact-gathering, we have forgotten that the vast multitude of facts is next to worthless; that the important thing is the significant fact.

In this sense, Dr. Blum's volume, intended primarily as a textbook, is excellent. It contains about 22,000 lines, and I daresay each line contains one or more facts—events, statements of others' opinions, points of established principle, and so on. But they do not come in pleonastic profusion, attested in bibliographical affidavits by good and poor experts alike. They are used with the selective economy of a shrewd man who takes the necessity of objective scholarship for granted. Cheap facts, easy views, insignificant phenomena, mere notions are kept out with the fine comb of intellectual pride. Hence the really vast knowledge of the man is truly impressive. Copernicus and the Doctrine of Labor Conspiracy, Kant and the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, the French Revolution and the B. and O. Plan in the railroad shops—they all find their relevant place. The injunction, the business cycle, social insurance of all kinds, the various theories of wages with cases in point; the conditions of employment and unemployment, the theoretical and actual forms of the boycott and the strike, the principles and programs and forms and functions of the various divisions in labor—all these are perspicaciously presented. It is not merely a thorough piece of work. It is a fine piece of workmanship.

Curiously enough, however, it is the very excellent workmanship on those problems in labor economics which the book covers that leaves one unsatisfied at the end. One's hopes are raised that this book gives a definitive view of contemporary American labor. Not that we need a didactic theory of labor. But we do need an interpretation of the clear tendencies of post-bellum labor: labor capitalism, company unionism, labor's needed orientation against the new vertical trust, its collapse of political action, the lunacy of its radical wings, the subtle fears which inhibit the new unionism generally. It is distinctly time to ask the labor movement where it is going—provided the question could be grounded on just such painfully gathered material as we find in this book. In short, it is time for just such a work as the "History of Labor in the United States," by Professor Commons and his associates, which was a definitive appraisal of American labor before the war. Commons's central thesis that labor somehow muddles through and on from the economic to the political field and then back again no longer holds good. What are the emerging directions?

Dr. Blum does not say. He suffers somewhat from the Fabian complex of the scholar who hesitates to draw conclusions even from the soundest of premises, and who tends to cover most fully those aspects of his subject with which he is most familiar. He spends over one hundred pages, most illuminatingly, on the relations between labor and law, as they developed in jurisprudence and in the courts. But he spends only forty-five pages on the forms of union organization; only a little over thirty pages on union tactics. He deals hardly at all with union politics. He really deals with the general structure of economic society, with special reference to labor. It is because he leaves so many pressing problems unanswered, and because he is just the sort of person whose opinions would be valuable, that one lays the book aside with a sense of incompleteness. It is one of those performances which leave little to criticism but something to wish for.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Toward an Understanding of Youth

The Revolt of Modern Youth. By Judge Ben B. Lindsey and Wainwright Evans. Boni and Liveright. $3.

The Education of the Modern Boy. A Collection of Papers by A. E. Stearns, S. S. Drury, Endicott Peabody, R. H. Howe, W. L. W. Field, and Wm. G. Thayer. Boston: Small, Maynard and Company. $3.

THE tolerance and good sense evidenced in Judge Lindsey's account of his methods in his dealing with juvenile delinquents in Denver make his book one which might well be compulsory reading for a large part of the population. The delinquencies in question are almost entirely of a sexual nature and the cases given are usually those of girls. Judge Lindsey gives a running picture of what he believes to be true of the American community: first, that of all the youth who go to parties and dances and auto rides 90 per cent or more indulge in hugging and kissing; second, that of this group at least 50 per cent indulge in other sex liberties; and third, that 15 to 25 per cent of the original 90 eventually participate in complete sexual experience. Out of five hundred girls who came to him or were sent to him he found only twenty-five who had become pregnant. He shows the youth of the land being brought up on the one gospel of not getting found out; but the darkest thing in his account is the manner in which parents and teachers attempt to meet the situation. The traditionalized behavior, the idiocy, and often the sadism of the adults involved in the stories he gives do not make for pleasant reading.

The judge's own attitude is repeatedly affirmed in vigorous language. "For these girls, happily, are not 'lost' and 'ruined' in the old sense, both because society sometimes deals more leniently with them than it once did, and also because relatively few of them encounter the exposure which might bring down upon them, and force them to believe, the destructive, anti-social suggestion, 'You are lost.'" Or again: "If it be a choice between 'sanctioning immorality' and virtually compelling terrified girls to practice abortion and infanticide, by all means let us sanction immorality, or at least admit that it is the lesser of the two evils."

Judge Lindsey's attitude toward the problems of youth has long been well known and his work in Colorado is justly famous. He very truly says that this work is a sort of "human artistry," for it deals in a psychology the first principles of which have not yet been formulated. Yet though it is necessary for him to win the confidence and often to change the behavior of the youths involved, the reader gains the impression that most of his duties turn not on eliminating the evil within the adolescent but on saving the adolescent from the evil that is in society. His accounts of conversations with girls who do not wish to marry and who have calmly and successfully flouted the conventions constitute important contributions to an understanding of youth. He attacks the ignorance of sex in which society attempts to keep the young, superstitious taboos against birth control, and a rigid acceptance of the present form of matrimony, declaring "that until society shall consent to make the institution of marriage sufficiently flexible to conduce to the happiness and freedom of persons who enter it, it is, in my judgment, going to be regarded by an increasingly large number of men and women as an intolerable yoke to be avoided at all costs." The judge's complete acceptance of the monogamous ideal and his great concern over the crime of abortion may bring a little amusement to the social scientist, but these are minor matters.

"The Education of the Modern Boy," by the headmasters of several private schools, is an exceedingly unimportant book. Topics considered are home influence, religious influence, academic influence, athletic influence, meeting the college entrance requirements, and the future trend of the private school. The last paper, by William G. Thayer, is intelligent.

LORINE PRUETTE

Books in Brief

The Waning of the Middle Ages. By J. Huizinga. Longmans, Green and Company. $5.40.

The best feature of this book is its emphasis upon the later Middle Ages as a "period of termination"—the end of a distinct medieval culture rather than a mere prelude to modern times. The forms of medieval life remained, but the spirit was dead and hence arose the curiously bizarre and decadent features of a society running the gamut of human emotions from "deep pessimism" to "violent joy," from mystical devotion to sensual indulgence, from the "complicated formalism of chivalry and love" to a Theocritean idealization of pastoral life. Professor Huizinga uses an impressive mass of evidence—chiefly from art and literature—to give a picture that is quite definite and yet leaves one unsatisfied. His illustrations often seem as extravagant as he supposes the later Middle Ages to have been; the translation is undistinguished; and no attention is given to the great social and economic movements that explain why the Middle Ages were waning.

Héloïse and Abélard. By George Moore. Boni and Liveright. Two volumes. $5.

For the first time this masterpiece of George Moore—he has two or three others—becomes available to the general public at a price which is not "limited." It is to be hoped that Mr. Moore has altered his views on the subject of pearls and swine. When "A Story-Teller's Holiday" appears in a trade edition we shall be satisfied that he has.

Mesa, Cañon and Pueblo. By Charles F. Lummis. The Century Company. $4.50.

The Land of Poco Tiempo. By Charles F. Lummis. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

Welcome reprints of two slightly overlapping classics of Southwestern travel. New Mexico's stock is steadily rising, and Mr. Lummis will continue to be one of the causes.

Silhouettes. By Sir Edmund Gosse. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

Still more book reviews from the engaging and never disturbing dean of English reviewers.

Spanish Mysticism. By E. Allison Peers. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

An introduction, chiefly through translated extracts, to thirteen Spanish mystics, from Hernando de Zárata to Luis de León.

First Impressions. Essays on Poetry, Criticism, and Prosody. By Llewellyn Jones. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Sensible and acute, though not always interesting, essays on contemporary American and British poetic theory and practice.

Drama Three Bad Plays

A COLLEGE instructor and an actor, collaborating to write "The Virgin" (Maxine Elliott's Theater), have managed to combine the worst features of both, for they have taken a theme which has distinct possibilities and made of it a play which is as melodramatic as an actor could wish without ceasing to be as far removed as a classroom lecture from any genuine contact with the primitive passions it attempts to portray.

The original conception—by no means a bad one—came, I fancy, from the academician. He had observed the fact that moral indignation and envy are closely akin and he was able to particularize to the extent of conceiving an admirable special case of this general fact, the case, namely, of a man whose exalted respect for the "purity" of a certain woman turns into a desire to rape and bully her by way of inflicting a punishment when he discovers that she is not as icily unapproachable by others as he had supposed. Having got this far and never having, I suspect, penetrated much below the skin into any real people, he was compelled to fall back upon the advice offered by all textbooks on creative writing, which is to invent characters appropriate to the theme in hand. This he proceeded to do as well as he or anybody else could in that schematic fashion. He invented a fanatical preacher whose Tolstoian principles caused him to leave his wife untouched, he invented a French-Canadian lumberman who would believe her a sort of accredited deputy of the Blessed Virgin herself, and then, his imagination growing a little feeble, he invented a young Georgian whom he brings all the way from his native State to hang rather uselessly about the stage until the appropriate moment arrives for him to kiss the all too human maid. The result, as my synopsis may indicate, was to produce a play with all the obviously mechanical manipulations and all the absence of genuine life which synthetic art invariably displays.

At this point (I am still reconstructing a hypothetical history) the work came to the attention of an actor and he, following the mental process usual in actors, concluded that nothing was needed except a little more violence. Let me, I can hear him say, knock a few people down from time to time when the action gets slow, let me, above all, drag the virgin about the floor for fifteen minutes or so, removing a bit of clothing from time to time, and your show is a sure-fire hit. The author, eager for the triumph of a Broadway production, consented; and the result is a cross between an academic imitation of Eugene O'Neill and something in the nature of Mr. Brady's or Mr. Woods's more earnest efforts with what is known as sex appeal. As serious drama it can hardly be taken seriously, and from the standpoint of those who patronized "The Good Bad Woman" there are too many irrelevancies. "When," I can hear them ask in a famous phrase, "do the ravishings begin?"

The only real pity is that the serious efforts of a very capable cast should be wasted. For Louis Bennison, who is coauthor and who plays the part of the simple-minded Canadian with much flashing of teeth and swelling of chest, I have no particular sympathy; but Lee Baker manages to give his portrayal of the fanatical preacher moments of real power, and Phyllis Povah makes more than could reasonably be expected out of the virgin whom the authors have so feebly characterized.

"Mama Loves Papa" (Forrest Theater), an exceedingly thin and conventional farce, and "The Creaking Chair" (Lyceum Theater), an equally conventional mystery play, complete the list of new plays for a very dull week. There are, however, two revivals. At the Princess Theater Violet Kemble Cooper is appearing in "The Unchastened Woman," while at the Hampden Theater Mr. Walter Hampden is again appearing as Cyrano de Bergerac—one of his most popular roles.

Portugal's African Slave States

By ALBIN E. JOHNSON

THERE was a time, not so long ago, when slavery was not regarded as highly reprehensible; nor was serfdom, nor peonage. Now, however, an international conscience frowns upon these ancient institutions; the new morality of Lincoln and Wilson and Viscount Cecil of Chelwood decrees that "involuntary servitude" shall no longer be tolerated on the earth. But, somehow, in Africa, when morality conflicts with economic law, when nature conspires against the ambitions of energetic Europeans who would wrest from the soil its latent wealth, the agents of Lisbon and Paris and London and Rome agree graciously to abolish slavery as such, and then announce to the credulous native that henceforth he need only engage in a little "compulsory labor" now and then.

It is the purpose of this article to deal only with the Portuguese colonies of Angola and Mozambique, although it is fair to say that conditions similar to those existing there are to be found in mandated territories of Great Britain, France, and Italy. But since the latter governments have made no defense of "forced labor" nor attacked the Slavery Protocol of Viscount Cecil, which is now being discussed and considered in the chancelleries of Europe, it may be hoped that these Powers will discourage that nefarious practice in the future.

Portugal, however, has not only refused to forswear "forced labor," which Lisbon designates by the less obnoxious term of "compulsory," in her colonies but actually argues that it is her duty to mankind and her obligation under the League Covenant "to exploit the richness and resources" of her African colonies, and that the end justifies the means.

The conditions that are alleged to exist in Angola and Mozambique need not be recapitulated. Professor Edward Alsworth Ross of the University of Wisconsin and Dr. R. Melville Cramer of New York City have devoted more than sixty printed pages to a report exposing them. The Nation, in its issue of August 12, 1925, printed the Ross-Cramer document in part. That the charges are taken seriously is evident from the fact that Portugal saw fit to dispatch a top-heavy delegation to the Sixth League Assembly to argue her case, and colonial committees to the Temporary Slavery Commission's sittings at Geneva, and has made an extensive reply in detail to the allegations of the two Americans. But the Portuguese arguments in favor of "compulsory labor" and Alfonso Augusto da Costa's opposition to that part of Viscount Cecil's protocol which deals with the discredited practice are unique in the annals of diplomacy. Hence their exposition.

Article 3 of Viscount Cecil's Anti-Slavery Protocol, presented to the League Assembly and approved as the basis of an international convention, reads:

The signatory states, recognizing the grave evils that may result from the employment of forced labor, except for essential public services, engage that, where it is necessary for special reasons to admit employment of forced labor, they will take all necessary precautions, particularly where labor belongs to the less advanced races, to prevent conditions analogous to those of slavery from resulting from such employment.

Like much of Lord Cecil's famous Geneva Opium Convention, the chief article in the Anti-Slavery Protocol is rather innocuous. It permits "forced labor" for "public services," which may be made to constitute almost anything. And in other "special cases" it only suggests that "all necessary precautions" be taken to safeguard against abuses. These "precautions" are left to the discretion of the authorities concerned.

But even this theoretical and limited curtailment of their colonial administrative powers is distasteful to the Portuguese. "We must distinguish between compulsory (or forced) labor, which should be avoided as far as possible, and the obligation to work," declares the Portuguese Foreign Ministry, adding:

The obligation to work is a law of nature, the scope of which the very progress of our civilization tends daily to enlarge. . . . We must not forbid compulsory labor in such a way as to suggest to the native races that its prohibition implies for them a right to idleness, and a permission to emancipate themselves from the law of work to which we are all subject. . . . This would be dangerous to everyone and for the natives themselves, because their well-being and development must proceed hand in hand with the economic development of the country. . . . This development can only be achieved by the science, capital, and labor of the colonizing race, working in close cooperation with the native populations.

Of the natives' antipathy to this "law of nature" to work the Portuguese make a great issue, pointing out that agricultural and industrial undertakings cannot hope to prosper without workmen and that it is their "right" to demand of the native population the labor necessary to carry on such undertakings. The natives, says Da Costa, are "often wealthy and indolent" and refuse to work even for the highest wages.

The native has few needs and makes his wives toil for his daily bread [explains Da Costa, espousing for the moment the cause of the weaker sex]. Work has no attraction for the native and he does not feel the need of it. . . . He often spends his day drinking native beer, taking snuff, and chatting. . . . And, therefore, since the welfare of the individual is in direct proportion to the material and economic development of their country, it is quite comprehensible that the authorities should exercise, albeit with great prudence and all the necessary tact, a certain moral pressure, which they are entitled to use by the very nature of the task they are called upon to perform. . . .

On the other hand, while discussing the subject of women carrying the hod, the Portuguese spokesman hastens to assert that the same women do not seem to mind it a bit; in fact, these faithful wives of African Negroes simply love to toil for their men. The Ross report regarded it "as surprising that women with babies on their backs should be sent in place of their husbands to work on the public highways." But Da Costa, pointing out that this is of course an "appeal to pity and humanitarian sentiment," says:

But it has no significance. . . . African Negresses never leave their children when they are young for fear that they will be stolen or eaten by wild beasts. . . . They tie the babies up on their backs and carry them along when they are working about their houses or in the fields . . . and even carry them during the interminable dances of which, especially at night, the blacks are so fond.

Ross further reports that when a man has been conscripted he often returns penniless to his village eight months or a year later. The American investigators learned that, according to the natives' own explanation, the planters often failed to pay them anything or treated them so cruelly that they were forced to run away before their work period expired, hence forfeiting their "fifty cents"; or else they alleged that the Portuguese cipaios, native police, or the official administradores, to whom the planters are often required to transmit the workers' pay, appropriated it for their own use.

But the Portuguese answer contains a warning:

It is not always advisable to believe what a native has to say. . . . The native, as anyone will know who has studied his psychology, will always say what he thinks his interrogator wants him to say. . . . A native returning after having worked for a specified time receives his wages. On his way home he finds opportunity to amuse himself and spend his money. When he reaches his village his wives ask him what he has done with his wages and naturally he then says that he has not been paid.

And so it goes, according to the Portuguese, even in darkest Africa.

And in this fashion, item after item, Lisbon answers the Ross-Cramer Report. When the Americans declare that the natives are forced to build "useless roads," Da Costa is quick to challenge the meaning of the word "useless." The natives are generously allowed to "plant pine-apples along the borders and so are the only people to profit by them."

In conclusion the Portuguese point out the nation's brilliant record as a colonizing Power: how Lisbon abolished slavery fully three decades before it ceased to flourish in America; how Portuguese missionaries were spreading the Gospel of Christ over Africa and the Orient, and even in the New World, long centuries ago, and how the Lisbon Government today (in Macao and Angola) is doing its share in continuing the civilizing work of those early crusaders.

Then, deferentially but specifically, Alfonso Augusto da Costa turns an accusing finger backwards and asks the distinguished persons who introduced the Ross-Cramer Report to the League to look into the condition of the black population in America, which "frequently complains that its members, although citizens of the United States by law, are not treated as such on account of difference of race and color."

Speaking brutally, "forced labor" is a necessity in the present Portuguese scheme of colonial administration (and probably in British Kenya, the Cameroons, and Togoland), just as "opium farms" are indispensable in Portugal's cess-pool of the Orient, Macao.

Reservations to the recent International Opium Convention, made by Portugal for Macao, which the American delegation even refused to dignify by participating in the final drafting, have for the time being rendered that questionable document wholly ineffective; Portugal's advance reservations to Lord Cecil's Slavery Protocol have strangled it before its birth.

A "United Front" in the Philippines

A SIGNIFICANT step in the campaign for Philippine independence is the signing of a coalition pact by the leaders of both major parties in the Philippines. The following text is taken from the Philippines Free Press (Manila) for January 16:

For some time past it has been noted that an organized and systematic campaign is being waged here, as well as in America, designed to induce the people of the United States to change their policy toward the Philippine Islands. The object is annexation. The activities shown by the American Chamber of Commerce, setting aside funds and sending men to the United States to carry out the campaign against independence; the extraordinary attention given to questions Philippine by important newspapers and magazines in America; and the series of publications which have appeared recently, as well as the frequent visits of American writers and publishers who seem to be studying local conditions only to advocate retention of the islands—all this shows an organized attempt to frustrate the fulfilment of the sacred promise of independence made to the Filipino people.

President Coolidge's recommendation in his last message to Congress, aimed at strengthening the powers of the Governor General, is the best proof that this anti-independence campaign may result in disaster to the cause of the country. Unless this campaign is checked immediately through the combined and united efforts of all elements which constitute Filipino nationality, specially of the political parties, the imperialist movement will gain ground gradually and we shall soon see blasted our hopes of nationality.

It has not been possible to conduct our independence campaign so firmly and energetically as it should be, due to a lack of unity of, and understanding between, the two major political parties of our country. While it is true that there exists absolute conformity in the principles of the platforms of the two parties as regards the national cause, in practice their efforts have been isolated and scattered, thereby dividing responsibility which should be assumed in common. This situation is becoming disastrous to the cause of independence, and should cease for its own good. All Filipinos should feel equally responsible, and, regardless of party expediency or religious creed, everybody should take active part in the direction and execution of the campaign for independence. The slogan should be Let American imperialism stand on one side and Filipino nationalism on the other.

In order to establish a mutual understanding between the two political parties of the Philippines and combine their efforts in the campaign for independence, the directorates of the Nacionalista and Democata parties agree upon the following

TERMS OF COVENANT

1. To create a National Supreme Council which shall be composed of ten members, five Nacionalistas and five Democatas, eight of whom, at least, shall be members of the legislature. This council shall have the high command of Filipino policy in everything concerning the independence campaign, in all matters that may affect the relations between the United States and the Philippines, and in the administration of the interests of the country at large. Its powers shall be not merely deliberative or advisory but also executive in its fullest sense. It shall prepare a program of its work and activities in connection with the independence campaign; organize and direct an intensive national campaign for the purpose of fomenting protective habits and stimulating native industries, and shall make recommendations to the legislature on matters of internal government. The Supreme Council may create an advisory body composed of technical men and other representative elements of the country, and also organize committees that

The directorates of the Nacionalista and Democrata parties shall secure ratification of the powers herein conferred upon the Supreme Council through their respective representatives in the legislature, and the presidents of both chambers of the legislature shall call a meeting of the Commission of Independence for the same purpose in so far as it may affect the campaign for independence.

2. The Supreme Council shall organize a commission which shall permanently reside in the United States and which shall not be dissolved until independence of the Philippines is obtained. One half of the members of this commission shall be appointed by the Supreme Council on recommendation of the Nacionalista Party, and the other half on recommendation of the Democrata Party, persons not affiliated with either party being eligible to membership on this commission.

3. That there shall be elected by the legislature a Democrata resident commissioner as soon as a vacancy occurs, in order that in the future the Filipino people may be represented in the Congress of the United States by commissioners elected and recommended by the Nacionalista and Democrata parties of the Philippines.

4. Any appeals to the Filipino people for contributions for the independence campaign shall be made by and in behalf of the Supreme Council, which shall exercise control and supervision of the collection, custody, and disbursements of such funds.

5. The present covenant shall apply to all the purposes sought in it after its approval by the directorates to the Nacionalista and Democrata parties.

MUSCLE SHOALS promises to produce one of the major scandals of the present Congress and Administration in Washington. The bill which was passed by the Senate on March 8 ends all possibility of government operation, or even regulation, of this tremendously important water-power and authorizes a congressional committee to receive and report by April 26 bids for leasing Muscle Shoals to a private enterprise. The intention is to grant a lease before the adjournment of the present session of Congress. The House has already passed the same measure, except for a few amendments introduced by the Senate, and President Coolidge is of course more than ready to sign almost any bill betraying the great national development in Alabama into the hands of the power interests. The one hope now seems to be that in a wrangle between the House and the Senate over the latter's amendments the measure may get side-tracked. The scandal of the proposed action is the greater because of the suppression of the report of the congressional commission appointed last year. This commission was picked with a view to obtaining a report against government ownership, but somehow it proved to be unexpectedly independent and reported in favor of such a solution. The report has never been heard of since.

A COMPLETE COLLAPSE of the Government's case was the only result of its endeavor to vacate the habeas corpus writ issued in the case of the Countess Cathcart. Its attorneys admitted that she had not been guilty of moral turpitude, since adultery is no crime in South Africa, and when the court asked if they had anything to offer to sustain the Department of Labor's contention that her case came under the law, they could only reply No—in utter confusion. Thereupon Judge Bondy gave the freedom of our shores to the Countess, precisely as this journal has pointed out would have to be done, and the Department of Labor stands convicted of incredible stupidity. But is it content with being thus disgraced? Not at all. In the absence of the Secretary, the Assistant Secretary—with the interesting name of Husband—announces that it will carry the case to the Supreme Court of the United States in order, we presume, that the department's stupidity, its prying into the private morals of visitors to this country, and its deliberate misinterpretation of the law shall be denounced by the highest court in the land. Entirely revealing is the statement made by the Assistant Secretary that for nineteen years the department has been pursuing this illegal policy—during which hundreds of poor and untitled women have, we suppose, been excluded—and its impudent and unblushing assertion that in doing so it has upheld American standards of morals against the European! Only Bernard Shaw's pen could do justice to this disgusting bit of self-complacency, holier-than-thou-ness, and hypocrisy.

ON MARCH 2 the cause of militant labor was tremendously advanced by the police of Passaic, New Jersey. On that day those worthy guardians of the peace, who had been systematically interfering with strikers' parades and assemblies, committed an error of judgment and assaulted New York newspaper men and women who were present. They struck and knocked down reporters of both sexes and deliberately smashed two motion-picture cameras and half a dozen "still" cameras—by way of proving their respect for law and the sacred right of private property. That put a different face on the matter in the eyes of every managing editor in New York. For once they became eager to face the facts as to the tyrannization of mill-town officials over labor to which they had shut their eyes, or which they had misrepresented or suppressed, these many years. The day after this happening the Passaic and Garfield strikers marched again, a woman with a baby-carriage leading, a hundred strikers wearing steel helmets and carrying gas masks, the intrepid reporters making themselves safe for publicity in armored cars or by flying overhead! This time the police used neither tear bombs nor firehose to deprive the strikers of their rights. Other facts of this strike we set forth elsewhere.

THE TRIAL in Brockton, Massachusetts, of Anthony Bimba, a communist editor of Brooklyn, on charges of blasphemy and sedition, is over. The charges grew out of an address delivered by Mr. Bimba before a meeting of Lithuanians in Brockton. The blasphemy charge was brought under a 300-year-old Puritan statute, and thus attracted much newspaper interest as an apparent attempt to revive the old-time blue laws. In point of fact it was not taken seriously by either prosecution or defense and was of little consequence in comparison with the charge of sedition, based under one of the numerous similar statutes enacted in a majority of our States during or after the World War in an epoch of public panic and reaction. Every one of these laws is contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, and there will be no safety for democracy in this country until they are repealed. Mr. Bimba was acquitted of blasphemy but convicted of sedition. Yet the judge himself showed his contempt for the folly and uselessness of the sedition law when he fined the prisoner $100. How ridiculous, if Mr. Bimba was actually guilty of an effort to overthrow the government, to visit upon him a punishment similar to that which he would have received for carrying a flask of whiskey in his hip-pocket!

AS WE GO TO PRESS the League of Nations is in the throes of the most dangerous crisis in its history, complicated by the fall of the Briand Ministry and by the shifting policy of the Baldwin Government necessitated by Sir Austen Chamberlain's taking his position in regard to the increase of the Council prior to action by his associates and in opposition to British public sentiment. There was something almost childish in the situation at Geneva when the session opened. Germany was demanding her seat in the Council all by herself and threatening to take her dolls and go home if another country were admitted to the sacred Council at the same time, thus tarnishing her prestige. Poland was insisting on simultaneous election with Germany and prophesying the collapse of her Government otherwise. France was backing Poland and threatening to black-ball Germany if Poland were turned down, while Sweden was upholding Germany and promising to block everything with her one vote if Poland should be admitted even with Germany's consent. China, Brazil, and Spain were also demanding Council seats and threatening to withdraw from the League itself if denied; Brazil and Uruguay were opposing Spain's entry, while Chile and the Central American republics were supporting Spain. The Argentine, finally, was threatening to withdraw if the Council were enlarged beyond one seat! Could anything be more petty? Of course what has set English opinion of all shades against the enlargement of the Council is the fact that if it is enlarged by the addition of both Germany and Poland there will be reestablished the old and murderous European balance of power. Certainly nothing could have happened to bear out more clearly the contentions of those opponents of the League, like ourselves, who have pointed out that the veto power exercised by each member of the Council was a fatal handicap to the amending of the Covenant and to the proper working of the Council.

THE STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS of the Briand Cabinet which gave up office on March 6 lay in the same cause—the fact that Briand is not a financier. Having no fiscal program of his own, he left it to Parliament to work out one in conjunction with his Minister of Finance. Thus, in the early stages of formulating the measure, Briand could not be voted out of office on its account. But as the bill took shape the Government gradually stood committed to what had been done, and, as this was not wholly acceptable to any group, the Chamber of Deputies, in a moment of dissatisfaction and annoyance, finally voted Briand out of office. The moment was a most unfortunate one from the standpoint both of French domestic interests and the success of the League of Nations meeting at Geneva. Yet we believe that France, as we recently said, is in a more hopeful position than last year, because then her people were opposed to drastic fiscal measures and Parliament dared not proceed against their wishes, whereas now the people are clamoring for action and Parliament is simply fiddling. It is easier to reform a parliament than a people. But time presses. Unless action to save the franc comes speedily, there may be nothing to salvage when it arrives.

SCANT REPORTS have been seeping out from Rome, where France laid her record in Syria before the Mandates Commission of the League of Nations. The French representatives, say brief dispatches, were subjected to "sharp and insistent" inquiries on justice, religion, and finance, or some such vague and imposing array of abstractions. At last the commission has prepared a report of the situation for the consideration of the League. Details of the report are not available as we go to press, but it is described as not sensational, nor yet a mere white-wash. If, as the Associated Press says, the commission has confined itself to constructive criticism, then it has revealed itself as possessed of an eye for the immediate future. Recriminations against the French authorities will not dispose of the stiff-necked Druses to bend toward amicable relations with them, nor will the French be thereby rendered the more patiently gentle with their difficult wards. On the other hand, the commission has in this case an opportunity to establish itself as an adequate censor of the administration of mandatory power. If it does not so establish itself, it will reveal its parent the League to be impotent in one of its most significant assumptions of power; and the plea for intervention made to the world three months ago by the Syrian leader, Ihsan Djabir Bey, remaining unanswered, will mark the fact.

A REAL HONEST-TO-GOODNESS censor has Canada—as devoted to saving his country from wicked ideas as if he were our own beloved Secretary of State. So he has barred that high-minded publication the New York Daily Mirror, one of our picture papers, because of what he is graciously pleased to describe as its occasionally unworthy character. In order to show his fairness it is reported that he is about to take like action with regard to two of the Mirror's ardent competitors in the chronicling of scandal, of crime, and of nudity. More than that, this happy censor has barred Liberty, the weekly off-shoot of the Chicago Tribune. Its sins have little to do with the world of today. It is punished because it published articles in regard to the late King Edward and Queen Alexandra which were misrepresentations and libelous. To this Liberty replies that its torch merely illuminated the Queen as the victim of her royal husband's penchant for pretty faces, which everybody knew. Well, we who are saving our country from the Karolyis and the Catharts are hardly in a position to throw stones at the Minister of Customs and Excises who preserves the morals of Canada. All of which increases the respect in which the rest of the world holds Anglo-Saxons, but makes us tremble lest it begin to laugh at us. For if once the civilized nations begin to laugh, a lot of our highly esteemed Anglo-American idols are likely to crash to earth.

TO THE MANY FELICITATIONS which have gone to Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes of the United States Supreme Court on his eighty-fifth birthday, we want to add ours, with profound thankfulness that so admirable a public servant and jurist has not only been preserved to the republic but at his advanced age is still capable of filling the duties he has already so well discharged for twenty-four years. That is unusual in itself; still more so is the fact that his lifelong liberalism is untarnished by the conservatism of age. No finer body of young men ever went into the service of the government than the group of Harvard men who volunteered at the outbreak of the Civil War. Of these Justice Holmes was one, and his gallantry resulted in three wounds, one at Antietam of such a severe nature that his recovery seemed impossible. The story of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes's search for his wounded son and namesake after that battle, entitled "My Hunt after 'The Captain,'" is not only one of the most touching articles from the pen of the famous father of this great Justice, but gives a most worth-while picture of the confusion, lack of organization, and inadequacy of the Medical Corps of the army of that day in dealing with wounded men. "The Captain" was not only found, but has already survived his wound sixty-four years. We heartily hope we may have him with us many years yet, abounding in wit and wisdom and philosophy, and imbued with the same true Americanism—with its sound belief in the freedom of the individual, freedom of speech, freedom of thought, and freedom of life—for which Justice Holmes and his group stood so valiantly in the greatest crisis of the republic.

OWEN R. LOVEJOY'S voluntary retirement as secretary of the National Child Labor Committee, after nearly twenty-two years of service, is a national loss. True, he has been only one of a multitude of men and women who, in similar positions, have served reform causes for a tithe of the salaries they could earn elsewhere. But few in this army of devoted public servants—public despite the fact that they are on private and not on the public pay rolls—have equaled Mr. Lovejoy in the tact and skill with which he has carried on the unending and extraordinarily difficult tasks with which he has had to deal, or the courage he has always displayed, even in the face of insuperable difficulties. We wish that it had been possible to chronicle other than failure for the greatest effort the Child Labor Committee made during Mr. Lovejoy's secretaryship—the effort to obtain a national child-labor law. But not that fact, nor the truth that there is still abominable industrial slavery of children in our supposedly civilized land, reflects any discredit upon those who, like him, have done their utmost, without thought of self, to break the shackles.

THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT has divided the country into more than the two classes which have come to be known as Drys and Wets. There is at least a third class which might be dubbed the Dry-Wets or the Wet-Drys. They are persons who—more or less surreptitiously—use intoxicating beverages themselves but for business, political, or other reasons publicly oppose the use of liquor by others. No census of the Dry-Wets ever has been taken and we shall not be so uncharitable as to guess at their number. It does seem, though, that they are especially prevalent among politicians. A bit of hypocrisy seems more or less necessary for success in politics, so it is hardly sporting in State Senator Courtlandt Nicoll of New York—reputed to be a Wet—to have proposed the following amendment to the prohibition-enforcement bill now pending in the legislature:

Any person who buys, sells, possesses, or uses a beverage, the use of which is illegal under the Eighteenth Amendment and the laws passed to secure the enforcement of that amendment, shall be debarred from holding any office or public trust.

Downright mean, we call that! It is a politician's immemorial privilege to make laws, not to obey them, and Senator Nicoll's scheme for smoking out the Dry-Wets promises to inject so much honesty into political life that it will no longer have any allure.

WHAT WILL BE the effect on company unions if the Cummins-Parker bill, designed to supplant the Railroad Labor Board by direct negotiation between transportation workers and their employers, becomes a law? The measure has the backing of the railway employees' unions, but its results can hardly be expected to be in every way to their interest. The Pennsylvania was the leader in establishing the company union in the railway field, setting up the plan among its shopmen in 1921. The United States Supreme Court decided that company unions were lawful under the transportation act of 1920, although it admitted that they were contrary to the wishes of Congress. The Railroad Labor Board, whatever its faults, did considerable to prevent the misrepresentation of employees through non-representative company unions. As no such check will exist under the new plan, it is possible that groups too weak to maintain independent unions will suffer some disadvantage. It is not without significance that the Pennsylvania Standard for February quoted President Atterbury as saying that "nothing in the proposed legislation would interfere with the present method in effect on the Pennsylvania Railroad for the handling of relations between officers and employees."

THE TREND toward bigger and better mergers is well illustrated by the figures for the power industry during 1925. The Electrical World reports that 560 companies were involved, of which 153 were absorbing companies and 407 were acquired companies. The total capitalization of the acquired companies was $1,957,263,000, or about one-fourth of the aggregate capitalization of the electric light and power industry. There was one merger of over $200,000,000, three more of over $125,000,000, and twenty-one absorptions of more than $25,000,000 each. The phenomenon was not confined to any one section of the country, but was nation-wide. In many instances the acquired companies in a single merger operated in several States, and even in widely separated sections of the country. Private capital is losing no time in digging in against the public control of giant power.

The Mexican Complications

IN the light of the interventionist propaganda against Mexico, now being conducted by certain interests, it seems proper to consider once more the recent questions that have been raised between the two countries. The old Mexican land law, prior to 1884, reserved to the state the ownership of the subsoil minerals. In 1884 the law was changed so that the surface owner also acquired the subsoil minerals. This is also the common law prevailing in the United States. Between 1884 and 1917, under the Porfirio Diaz regime, when Mexico changed the law back to its original status, a great deal of land was purchased in Mexico by oil and mining companies, with a view to holding in reserve the exploitation of these natural resources. The Mexican constitution of 1917 and the laws passed pursuant thereto would have severed the subsoil minerals from the ownership of the surface by reserving these minerals to the state. The new laws were regarded by the United States as retroactive and confiscatory measures. By interpretation, therefore, the Mexican law was then modified so as to leave to the surface owners, who had begun their search for oil or minerals and broken ground prior to 1917, the privilege of continuing their efforts to reduce to possession the subsoil minerals. But those who had not broken ground before 1917 were not regarded as having a vested right in perpetuity to search for oil, and as to these owners the constitution and laws of 1917 were still deemed applicable. The United States, however, still asserted the view that at the time when the property was acquired ownership of the soil gave all rights to the center of the earth and to the sky above. Mexico does not share this common-law view of a vested right and the first dispute between the countries is a difference in the meaning of the term "vested right." There is no international definition of the term, and the Mexican view is probably as valid as ours. After what the United States has done to the vested rights acquired in this country by German, Austrian, and Hungarian citizens, it seems hypocritical to talk unctuously about the vested rights of American citizens abroad. The police power in this country is continually wiping out without compensation property rights duly acquired—for example, under the prohibition law. It is another case of the beam and the mote. Self-respect requires a modicum of consistency.

Mexico also claims that she will not permit foreigners to own land around the borders of Mexico nor any land inside the country unless the foreigner renounces with respect to the ownership of that land his privileged diplomatic position as a foreigner. Foreigners or foreign corporations now owning land have a long time within which to sell. Here also the California land legislation as to Japanese and the laws of our States prohibiting aliens from owning or inheriting land would seem to bar any serious protest. We also take the position that Mexico cannot validly request any foreigner to renounce his privilege of calling upon the diplomatic protection of his own government on the ground that this is a privilege of the government and not of the individual, which the individual, therefore, is not in a position validly to renounce. This seems a specious quibble, but it has been sustained by some international courts and denied by others. Mexico dislikes the necessity of placing foreigners in such an advantage in Mexico.

Under our claims treaty with Mexico, we imposed liability, as a condition of recognition, for all damages suffered by American citizens in Mexico since 1910 through all the various revolutionary movements. Such liability far exceeds that imposed by international law, which relieves the government from liability for injuries committed by insurgents beyond its control. The claims convention also makes Mexico liable for injuries by mutinies or mobs or certain insurrectionary forces or bandits, provided it can be shown that the appropriate authorities omitted to take reasonable measures to suppress these disturbing forces, or in other respects were at fault. The Mexican agent, in an argument before the Claims Commission in regular course, sought to show that certain forces and bodies committing injuries were in fact bandits, and not revolutionary forces for which Mexico assumed unequivocal liability. Because he dared to make such a legal argument—a matter quite within his privilege and not heretofore deemed an appropriate subject for adverse criticism—the New York Times published a heading to an inflammatory article "Declares Mexico Repudiates Claims." The questions arise, Who is responsible for this propaganda? What interests desire intervention in Mexico?

The financial interests? Hardly. Mexico's first move under the Calles administration was to negotiate a new agreement for the payment of her international obligations. Mexico could, following the European example, have postponed the settlement of her foreign debt. Instead her treasury is making regular payments to the Lamont Committee. It is absurd to suppose that the bankers have any desire to impede the validation of half a billion dollars' worth of securities.

The oil men? They have long been trouble makers, high-handed law-breakers in Mexico. They have plotted intervention in the past. The fact is, however, that the present legislation in Mexico really confiscates not a drop of oil belonging to them.

Does the Catholic church desire intervention? For several weeks the Archbishop of Baltimore has filled the press with his denunciations. America, the Jesuit organ, in many respects an enlightened weekly when it was edited by Father Richard H. Tierney, attempts in a leading article to prove that the Mexican anti-clericalism is related to high cost of binder-twine and rubber to the American consumer. The expelled foreign priests and nuns upon arrival here are headlined with "Horrors in Mexico" in the Times and with "Mexican Terror" in the Tribune, although a reading of the interviews (which can scarcely be considered unbiased) fails to reveal any horrors beyond the fact of expulsion in conformity with the Mexican law. In Congress Representative John J. Boylan demands breaking off of our diplomatic relations "until Mexico revises her present constitution." It would be unfortunate if the American Catholic hierarchy placed itself in the un-American position of fomenting a religious conflict. This is Mexico's affair and the issue is really not over religion at all but of persistent clerical interference in state matters which Mexico is trying to end once for all after a hundred years of it.

Justice for the Virgin Islands

NINE years after our acquisition from Denmark of her possessions in the West Indies there is a prospect that we may give them some of the democracy which they artlessly thought would be theirs as a matter of course upon coming under the sovereignty of the United States. In point of fact our neglect has resulted in saddling upon them an autocratic and unsympathetic succession of satraps, so that whereas in 1917 they were whole-heartedly in favor of our advent they are today sorry for the withdrawal of Denmark. But although our naval government has made a mighty mess of things—as also in Samoa and Guam—the Virgin Islanders are a generous and a friendly people, who will become the most loyal of Americans the moment we indicate we want them in our body politic.

Thanks to Representative Robert Bacon of New York, a bill (H. R. 9395) is now before Congress which, if enacted into law, will end our nine years of absolutism and mismanagement by conferring upon the inhabitants American citizenship, universal suffrage, and a civilian government resting upon a large measure of self-rule. This bill, drawn in considerable measure by A. A. Berle, Jr., of New York City, has been approved by representatives of the Navy Department and the Treasury and by prominent members of the Colonial Councils of the Virgin Islands. It deserves the support in and out of Congress of all those who believe that our island territories should be governed with at least an approach to the same civil rights and self-determination which we demand for ourselves.

There is every reason to suppose that the treaty by which the Virgin Islands passed from Denmark to the United States intended to make the inhabitants of the islands American citizens unless they took specific steps to the contrary. But the presence of two somewhat contradictory provisions in the treaty was seized upon by our none too democratic administration at Washington to deny this right, with the result that the Virgin Islanders have been literally men and women without a country. The several thousand of them domiciled here in the continental United States have, on the one hand, been denied the right to vote on the ground that they were not citizens, while, on the other hand, they have been refused access to citizenship through the process of naturalization. The Bacon bill does away with this absurdity by making American citizens of Virgin Islanders both here and in the West Indies.

According to the present "temporary government," the Virgin Islands are virtually a pocket borough of the President. His power there is almost absolute, if he choose to exercise it, but in fact he has turned it over to the navy, whose bureaucrats have exercised all the snobbery and bossism that petty minds are prone to wherever they are given a free rein over a people helpless to protect itself through distance and the lack of an adequate press. The Bacon bill proposes to end this by establishing a civilian administration, headed by a governor to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Colonial Councils would become genuine legislative bodies instead of restricted and largely powerless assemblies as at present. Moreover the vicious property qualification by which most of the islanders are now disfranchised would be abolished, to be superseded by suffrage for all men and women over twenty-one who can read and write English. There has been some criticism in this country of the literacy qualification, it having been said in one quarter that this limitation was inspired by the sugar interests. As a fact it is especially advocated by the labor organizations of the islands, and is aimed not at the native Negroes (constituting nine-tenths of the population), who almost all speak and read English, but at certain more recently arrived European elements.

Finally, the Bacon measure contains a bill of rights modeled after that in the Constitution of the United States. In this connection we may note that the appeal of Rothschild Francis, editor of the Emancipator of St. Thomas, has just been decided by the federal court in Philadelphia to which it was carried. Mr. Francis was convicted by an island judge of having libeled a police officer by an article in the Emancipator. He was later convicted of contempt of court for criticizing in his newspaper the verdict against him. The Philadelphia court, by a queer twist of logic, has upheld the sentence for contempt but overthrown the verdict of libel upon which it was based. Is it that a judge may call a court wrong but an editor may not? The Philadelphia decision will probably be carried higher. More needed is a general movement to take away from the courts the usurped and unconstitutional power to punish criticism as contempt. It constitutes an illegal and unauthorized censorship of the press.

The Defeated Railway Merger

GENERALLY SPEAKING The Nation is averse to tooting too loudly its own saxophone. But there are times when modesty is a mistake. Thus having been reliably informed that our pages were a chief, if not the chief, influence in defeating the 9,000-mile railway merger of the Van Sweringen brothers, we think our readers ought to know about it. Toward the close of the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission Hobart S. Bird, counsel for a group of the Chesapeake and Ohio stockholders who were opposing the proposed unification, saw in The Nation of December 2, last, the address of Professor W. Z. Ripley of Harvard University before the Academy of Political Science, calling attention to the danger of modern stock issues in which control is vested in closely held common shares while the money is put up by the investing public in return for preferred or Class A or B issues, devoid of voting power.

Mr. Bird knew that Professor Ripley had often been called as an expert by the Interstate Commerce Commission and had the highest standing with it. Hence, in his brief Mr. Bird incorporated in full the views of Professor Ripley as printed in The Nation. These views were also taken up by the New York World, and came to have so important a bearing upon the case that the Van Sweringens' counsel asked permission to file a special answer to them. Permission to do this was refused on the ground that the hearing had then been closed. As the decision against the merger was based chiefly on the issue raised by Professor Ripley, The Nation may claim a share in obtaining the ruling because of having made Professor Ripley's views available for presentation before the commission.

The story and the amazing rise of the Van Sweringen brothers is told by Mr. Bird himself elsewhere in this issue. It is a romantic narrative of the enormous possibilities of wealth and power obtainable almost overnight by shrewd manipulators of our existing system of credit and industry. The Van Sweringens entered the railroad field after the great pioneers in it were dead or had retired—at a moment when most of our industrial generals had turned to automobiles, electric development, or other newer playthings. The Van Sweringens saw the possibilities for unification opened up by the transportation act of 1920. They probably kept within the law in their dealings and certainly within the ethical code of our modern buccaneers of business. Their success is due to long vision, quickness on the trigger, and a willingness to pay well for what they wanted—to let the other fellow in for a good thing, too, whenever they were trying to put over a deal.

The decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission need not permanently prevent their proposed merger. The objection is solely to its financial aspects, which may be satisfactorily altered if the Van Sweringens so wish. As a transportation scheme the plan is distinctly approved by the commission. For this reason we welcome the decision. It is not mere "trust busting." On the contrary, it is a constructive use of the powers of the commission to protect the public on the financial side while at the same time making possible a physical development which would probably be to the advantage of all concerned.

Two Hundred Years of Gulliver

IN November, 1726, a few weeks after "Gulliver's Travels" had appeared and swept all England, Alexander Pope wrote to his friend Jonathan Swift in Dublin saying that the publisher of the book, one Benjamin Motte, was curiously uncertain as to the source from which the manuscript had come. "Motte," explained Pope, "received the copy, he tells me, he knew not from whence, nor from whom, dropped at his house in the dark from a hackney coach. By computing the time, I found it was after you left England, so for my part I suspend my judgment." No one knew better than Pope who had written "Gulliver," for he had heard all about it in letters from the Dean of St. Patrick's and indeed the work was merely the execution of a plan once formed by Pope, John Gay, Dr. Arbuthnot, and Swift for a universal satire upon humankind. Furthermore, it had been Pope—always a trickster—who conveyed the manuscript under cover of night to Benjamin Motte; and incidentally it was Pope who in this connection secured the only royalties for Swift—two hundred pounds—which his writing ever brought. One of the greatest of all the writers of England or the world was quite without pride of authorship—he did not sign "Gulliver," and the several hundred other works by him were anonymous save in one instance, when he let his name be used because the profits were to go for charity.

Pope, Gay, and the rest continued for a time to play the game of mystification which Pope was playing in his letter of November. It was not long, however, before the world was aware that it had a masterpiece, and was aware who had composed it.

It is to be hoped that others besides ourselves will celebrate this year the bicentenary of such a book as will perhaps never have to be written again. We should like to know what the race is thinking by this time of the heaviest dose of criticism it ever got. Mr. Mencken has just brought out a new edition of "Gulliver" with—of course—an enthusiastic introduction. But Mr. Mencken has always seemed to agree with Swift, who agreed with the king of Brobdingnag that the bulk of us are "the most pernicious race of little odious vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth." What of this bulk itself? What has it to say?

Swift made it clear enough to Pope who it was that he attacked:

I have ever hated all nations, professions, and communities, and all my love is toward individuals; for instance, I hate the tribe of lawyers, but I love Counsellor Such-a-one. . . . But principally I hate and detest that animal called man, although I heartily love John, Peter, Thomas, and so forth. . . . I have got materials toward a treatise proving the falsity of that definition animal rationale, and to show it should be only rationis capax. Upon this great foundation of misanthropy, though not in Timon's manner, the whole building of my "Travels" is erected; and I never will have peace of mind till all honest men are of my opinion.

And at least one contemporary was said to see the moral of "Gulliver." "The Duchess Dowager of Marlborough," wrote Gay and Pope none too seriously to Swift, "is in raptures at it; she says she can dream of nothing else since she read it. She declares that she has now found out that her whole life has been lost in caressing the worst part of mankind, and treating the best as her foes." Nor was the Duchess alone in her raptures. The first edition of this bitter book was exhausted within a week, and others were as quickly exhausted. "Gulliver" has never given offense. We have read it with undiluted pleasure during 200 years—for a century it has been a classic for children. But that animal called man has still not spoken.

The reason doubtless is that every reader of "Gulliver" has instantly placed himself with John, Peter, Thomas, and so forth. Like the great Duchess herself he has grasped at the beginning the distinction which must be made—if the spectacle of human life is to remain at all tolerable—between the many and the few; and he has felt very certain that he was one of the few. How else could he endure to go on with Swift as he pursues his painful and irresistible analysis of the weaknesses of men? He might turn his back upon the railings of a Timon; he must listen to a Gulliver. For Gulliver is weirdly convincing. Swift's glory is that he has more than stated his charge; he has proved it. He has done this by his art; he has told an entrancing tale which in spite of oneself one becomes interested in. He has done it also by his logic; he has devised a series of traps into which the running mind must fall. The deepest of these is in the last and best book. Gulliver, coming by chance into a country whose noblest creatures look like horses and whose yahoos look like men, is naturally mistaken by the horses for a yahoo. When he protests that the resemblance is only in the body, and refers to a mind within which makes him worthy of comparison with a Houyhnhnm, he is courteously given a chance to describe the civilization which he has left and the history—including the wars—which that civilization has achieved. The result is nothing if not humiliating. If every reader is Gulliver, it is to be hoped that every reader takes this most cleansing bath of self-examination, even if he thinks he takes it only for his race. The millennium will be here when all men read "Gulliver's Travels" as children read it, and do not need to be ashamed.

Los Angeles and Its News

OUR readers will recall that under the title of Los Angeles's Campaign of Silence we printed on September 9, last, an article by William Boardman Knox, who had been an editor of the Los Angeles illustrated Daily News. This article has brought us many letters of protest and reply, including one of February 10 from A. G. Arnoll, the secretary of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce. One from Ralph W. Trueblood, executive editor of the Los Angeles Times, who denies the conspiracy of silence by the Los Angeles press in dealing with the infantile-paralysis epidemic, has been printed in the Editor and Publisher and elsewhere. Mr. Trueblood goes straight to the point, which is not the case with various other correspondents who have entirely misunderstood the issue and have, for instance, like Mr. Arnoll, twisted Mr. Knox's statement of fact as to the hoof-and-mouth disease into an attack upon the rigid State quarantine.

Mr. Trueblood wrote us, in part, as follows:

So far as the Times is concerned, the facts are these: Between June 16, when infantile paralysis was declared prevalent in the State by the State Board of Health, and October 20, when Los Angeles was officially declared free of the disease, the Times printed fifty-nine separate news articles regarding the situation, an aggregate of 282 inches of type, column measure. The articles ranged in length from a minimum of two and one-half inches to a maximum of twenty-one and one-half inches. Frequently these articles were displayed on the first page and in no case was there any effort to conceal or "play them down." Each article brought the situation up to date from the preceding report, giving the number of new cases, total for the week, total for month, and usually the grand total from the beginning. In the early part of the period mentioned and at intervals thereafter these articles gave carefully prepared directions to the public for guarding against the disease and for handling it when it should appear. Notwithstanding your allegation that the business interests of Los Angeles were in a conspiracy to suppress these facts, the Times did not receive a single protest against their publication.

To this Mr. Knox, in a letter addressed to The Nation, replies as follows:

Mr. Trueblood by separating my statement from its context succeeds in making me say something I did not say. Not only did I make no attempt to deny that the infantile paralysis in some form was discussed but I go so far as to give concrete examples of statements issued to and published by the press of Los Angeles, and it was one of the points of my article that the suppression was doubly effective because misleading information was disseminated. Mr. Trueblood, in his letter to you, shows clearly the state of mind in which he approached the epidemic by referring to it as the time or rather the date "when infantile paralysis was declared prevalent in the State," with no reference to any epidemic in Los Angeles.

Mr. Trueblood's own figures are enlightening. He says that his paper published 282 inches of space in 59 separate articles, which, according to my mathematics, averaged a little more than four inches to the story, about a finger's depth, which for a somewhat devastating epidemic was certainly not a sensational play. Files of the Los Angeles Times will very simply and quickly demonstrate the spirit with which this situation was handled by the paper. He says that my statements in regard to water and bubonic plague are false. Inasmuch as they are, without exception, taken from official reports, any falsehood is nothing which either you or I could help or for which we could be held accountable, and I suggest that he take the matter up with Dr. Brem and Dr. Parsons of Los Angeles.

It is not denied by anyone that Mr. Knox was present at meetings of the Chamber of Commerce; nor are some of his most important statements challenged by his critics. Indeed, Mr. Arnoll himself makes the statement that during the infantile-paralysis epidemic "the press . . . did not permit publicity which would either suppress the facts or magnify them," which admits control.

From Dr. John Randolph Haynes, a member of the Board of Water and Power Commissioners at Los Angeles, comes a clear-cut challenge of Mr. Knox's statements as to the water supply. Dr. Haynes's quarrel is, however, as Mr. Knox shows, with Dr. Walter V. Brem and Dr. Parsons. Dr. Brem's high standing as a bacteriologist is beyond question. Mr. Knox went out of his way, however, to state in his article that there is another school of bacteriologists in Los Angeles "who claim that the constant discovery of B. coli (colon bacilli) in Los Angeles reservoirs is a matter of no importance and that the water has all the healing properties of the pool of Bethesda." Writing for the Chamber of Commerce Mr. Arnoll admits that there have been times when the water has been "slightly impaired as far as palatability was concerned," but that it was "at no time below requirements necessary for a healthful city water." Mr. Arnoll cites a statement of the secretary of the State Board of Health that the Los Angeles water supply is beyond reproach.

On the other side, we have been assured by the managing news editor of the Los Angeles Daily News at the time that Mr. Knox was connected with that paper that his statements were correct, and we have also received a letter from a reader who declares that although he read the Times and Herald daily he "never saw a mention made of infantile paralysis until December 5, 1925."

To print all the letters we have received would take more space than we can possibly spare for them. We may, however, state our own conclusion after carefully going over the subject: We believe that in its main thesis Mr. Knox's article was correct. But we must admit that to prove his points Mr. Knox resorted to too sweeping statements, which he should have avoided and the editor of his manuscript should have caught. Specifically, Mr. Knox exaggerated grossly when he declared that the whole of Los Angeles's economic structure began to totter as a result of the epidemics and that her bank clearings were cut in half. Figures obtained from Los Angeles show that the clearings did drop in the period under discussion, March to August, 1924, from $644,338,609 to $532,097,664, that is, $112,240,945. But during the same period in 1925 they also fell off $50,597,257. Mr. Knox would have made his point sufficiently had he but given the official figures. He also exaggerated in saying that land values dropped 50 per cent. We regret that this injustice to the facts was done in our columns and express our indebtedness to our several correspondents who have placed their views before us.

HERCULES HAD MADE HIS MILLIONS. "I shall now," quoth he, "bestow a wonderful blessing upon mankind."

"I SHALL PRINT A PAPER which every living creature in this great city can understand." And so he hired himself (for a million dollars a year) a Man of Brains who could write articles in words of three letters.

AND HE SENT to one of our leading universities for the dumbest freshman and him he made literary adviser, and he published his first issue.

BUT ALAS, THE NEXT DAY his Investigation Department brought him someone who did not understand his paper.

AND SO HE FIRED his entire staff and hired (for two million a year) another Man of Brains who could write articles in words of two letters.

AND HE SENT to a famous School for Backward Children and asked for their backwardest pupil and he made him literary adviser, and he published his second issue.

BUT ALAS, THE NEXT DAY his Investigation Department brought him someone who did not understand his paper.

The Van Sweringens Turn Nickel Plate into Gold

By HOBART S. BIRD

THE alchemists of olden times who sought to turn baser metals into gold would have seen their dreams more than realized had they lived to witness the accomplishments in this generation of the Van Sweringen brothers of Cleveland. These two men, neither of them out of his forties, have not only made gold from Nickel Plate but also from air and water. They have sold water at enormous profit in the stock issues of various properties, chiefly railroads, that they have acquired and reorganized. They have turned even air into gold, having an estimated profit of $16,000,000 on the building value above ground of the terminal site which they acquired a few years ago in Cleveland.

All in all these two men are believed to have made, actually or potentially, about $80,000,000 out of a cash investment of some half a million. Most of this money was accumulated in about two years previous to 1924, in which latter year the Van Sweringens came into public view as the organizers of a projected railroad empire of over 9,000 miles, valued at $1,600,000,000.

Permission to put this plan into effect has just been denied by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The newspapers have told us that. What the newspapers have failed to tell us is that merger or no merger the profits of the Van Sweringens are for the most part secure. It is possible, too, that the unification will eventually be permitted. The Interstate Commerce Commission has approved it as a transportation project. The grounds of objection are purely financial. The commission takes exception to the extent to which control is vested in the Van Sweringens while the actual ownership was in outside investors without any vote. The commission also objects to the ruthless way in which minorities were handled in bringing about the merger. The proposed combination may be reorganized financially, the obnoxious non-voting-stock feature eliminated, and the Van Sweringens still remain in control, with their profits intact.

THEY ONCE DELIVERED NEWSPAPERS

What makes the position of the Van Sweringens unusually spectacular, and typically American, is that they have risen to their present heights from a young manhood devoted to delivering newspapers. Oris P. Van Sweringen, when twenty-one years of age, quit his earlier occupations and, taking his nineteen-year-old brother, Mantis J., as a partner, went into real estate. They took over a development known as Shaker Heights, near Cleveland, which had previously been a failure. This was in 1900. They made the new tract valuable by rapid transit to Cleveland.

Both of the Van Sweringens are still boyish in appearance and neither is married. At the recent hearings of the Interstate Commerce Commission in Washington they were the most inconspicuous persons present. When O. P. Van Sweringen came forward smiling and debonair to tell his story he was all deference, courtesy, and urbanity. When a pencil or paper accidentally dropped from the hands of one of the commissioners or of one of the counsel, he was the first to spring from his seat to restore it to the owner.

In order to understand the spectacular events which finally culminated in the plan for the great railway merger which has just been passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission one must go back to the year 1909. It was then that the Van Sweringens acquired four acres of land in the heart of Cleveland as a site for the terminal of the rapid-transit line which they were planning to build. In 1911 they organized the Cleveland and Youngstown Railroad Company to operate an electric line and began acquiring a right of way through a part of the city in which they had some years previously delivered newspapers from house to house. They had to cross the tracks of the Cleveland Short Line, a railroad owned by the New York Central. They met A. H. Smith. He made the suggestion which led to the great expansion that followed. The New York Central at that time was sending its freight into Cleveland by tracks lying level with the water. The better part of Cleveland's business section is on a considerably higher level, and Mr. Smith asked the Van Sweringens if they thought land could be acquired at a reasonable price for a freight station on this upper elevation. The young real-estate operators astutely replied that it could be.

A ROUTE INTO CLEVELAND

In consequence an agreement was reached in 1913 between the Van Sweringens and the New York Central for the construction of a four-track route into Cleveland and the building of a freight station. It was provided that upon completion the freight house was to be deeded to the New York Central and that that railway was to have half of the right of way. In return the New York Central agreed to advance the funds necessary to carry out the project.

Proceeding with the construction of their trolley line and the acquisition of a right of way, the Van Sweringens ran across the tracks of the New York, Chicago and St. Louis Railroad, popularly known as the Nickel Plate. It dawned on them that the tracks of this railroad would furnish them their most direct route to their haven in the center of Cleveland. The fact that this road was owned by the New York Central seemed propitious. They started negotiations for the right to use the Nickel Plate tracks for their trolley, but did not reach a definite stage until in 1916, when under a new law the New York Central was obliged to dispose of its control of the Nickel Plate because of a prohibition against one railroad controlling another competitive line. The New York Central had bought the Nickel Plate for the very purpose of preventing competition and had been letting it rot. The New York Central had no use for the line but naturally did not want it to fall into unfriendly hands. It was then that the Van Sweringens conceived the idea of acquiring not only a right of way over the Nickel Plate into Cleveland but of purchasing the entire railroad. It seems like a fantastic scheme to buy a railroad just to get a trolley line and a stub-end terminal, but the Van Sweringens had not outgrown their belief in Santa Claus and went straightway to New York City where railroads are bought and sold.

It was suggested they should pay $2,000,000 in cash and $6,500,000 in promissory notes. To this the Van Sweringens could make no possible objection except that they did not happen to have $2,000,000. Fortunately a way opened. They were able to get a temporary loan of $2,100,000 from the Guardian Savings and Trust Company of Cleveland on the strength of their shrewd bargain. The Van Sweringens then organized a holding corporation, the Nickel Plate Securities Company. Stock was issued to the extent of $2,500,000 in par value non-voting preferred shares and $12,500,000 in common. The preferred was issued for cash to pay off the loan. The Van Sweringen subscription was for $520,000 of the preferred and they received three-fourths of the common. J. R. Nutt and C. L. Bradley of Cleveland subscribed to $1,490,000 worth of the preferred and received a fourth of the common. The $520,000 was the only cash which the Van Sweringens personally put up in all their career of railroad acquisition and reorganization, and even this sum was offset by sale on their part of some of their common stock.

TRUE FINANCIERS

The Van Sweringens then showed themselves to be true financiers. They had the Nickel Plate declare a dividend which brought in about half a million dollars of new capital. Besides this the Nickel Plate, when they took it over, had in its treasury in cash and securities $3,982,307.93. The cash payment for it had been only $2,000,000. The realtors were now on their way.

Up to about 1917 the terminal in Cleveland was to have been for the accommodation of the Nickel Plate Railroad and the Van Sweringen trolley line, the latter using the right of way of the former as an approach to the station. According to O. P. Van Sweringen it was the New York Central that proposed the next big development. Mr. Smith, who had by now become president of the road, proposed that other railways be brought in and that the terminal be made a union station in the center of Cleveland's business district. Eventually the New York Central, the Big Four, and the Nickel Plate arranged for a union station and agreed to guarantee a bond issue of $60,000,000.

At the same time a contract was made with the Union Traction Terminals Company, a corporation with no property and only $10,000 of capital stock—all owned by the Van Sweringens—for a lease of part of the terminal building to be set aside for local traction purposes. This new company was to acquire the Van Sweringen trolley line and other traction systems. The company contracted to pay to the railroads $850,000 a year rent for the traction section, but the rent it is to receive from concessionnaires, news-stands, and the like is at least $820,000. So these traction rights, whatever they were worth, were obtained by the Van Sweringens without any cost. The cost of construction to the railroads of this portion of the terminal is estimated at $14,000,000, exclusive of the land. The so-called air rights, valued at $16,000,000, were also obtained without cost to the Van Sweringens. Through an intricate system of subholdings the terminal property is now in control of the Vaness Company, a general holding corporation for the Van Sweringen brothers. When it came to conveying the terminal real estate to the new union-station company the Van Sweringens reserved the rights above the surface in the station area. In consideration for them they gave the railroads a perpetual easement over the approach to the station. It was also provided that the railroad companies should excavate for and build foundations below the surface for the superstructures, the railroad tracks to be located forty feet below the street level. The cost of laying this foundation is estimated at about $2,000,- 000. The excavation below the street level takes away no available space from the Van Sweringens. The net result of its construction is a contribution of $2,000,000 toward the erection of the building above it. These air rights, as already stated, are estimated as worth about $16,000,000—this is Mr. Van Sweringen's own appraisal. In addition the traction facilities already alluded to are worth at least their cost, $14,000,000, giving the Van Sweringens a profit of about $30,000,000 on the Cleveland terminal alone.

It was the foregoing transaction, but without a disclosure of the facts set forth, which the Interstate Commerce Commission approved in 1921, when William A. Colston was director of finance and J. H. Agate was examiner. Colonel Colston first made an adverse report, acting upon which the commission denied the application. Later a rehearing was requested, and Colonel Colston, still director of finance, made the report upon which a rehearing was granted. As a result of the rehearing the application was sanctioned on December 6, 1921. On May 1, 1922, Colonel Colston resigned his position with the commission and became general counsel and vice-president of the Nickel Plate Railroad at a salary of $30,000 a year. As such he has been in charge of the proceedings to obtain the sanction of the commission to the Van Sweringen merger. In May, 1922, the application of the Cleveland Union Terminals Company to issue $10,000 in stock and $12,000,000 in bonds came before Mr. Agate as examiner for the Interstate Commerce Commission. The application was granted. Within a year thereafter Mr. Agate resigned from the Interstate Commerce Commission and became chief assistant to Colonel Colston in the service of the Nickel Plate Railroad.

ANOTHER JACKPOT

The Van Sweringens gathered in another jackpot in 1922. They purchased from Walter L. Ross, receiver of the Clover Leaf system (the Toledo, St. Louis and Western), 31,885 shares of preferred and 46,515 shares of common stock. Mr. Ross sold this stock as agent for the estates of Edward F. Searles and Thomas H. Hubbard for $2,744,000, one-half of which went to Mr. Ross as commission for making the sale while he was also receiver of the road. There was no cash payment. The entire purchase price was paid in notes secured by the stock purchased and by 30,000 additional shares acquired elsewhere in order to secure control to the Van Sweringens. These shares cost $750,000, the only cash required, and in order to make this payment the Van Sweringens had the Clover Leaf declare a dividend of 4 per cent within a month after purchase and before turning over the road to the consolidated company. This dividend netted them $734,000, so that the cash required to buy the railroad was virtually taken out of its own treasury. The Clover Leaf had in its treasury some $3,000,000 in cash and securities at the time. During all the period of its receivership since 1912 it had not before paid any dividends upon its stock. According to the testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission of the president of the Nickel Plate Railroad, this transaction was assisted, if not indeed made possible, by a simultaneous agreement with Mr. Ross personally whereby the Van Sweringens undertook to find employment for him at a guaranteed compensation of $250,000 for five years. In pursuance of this agreement Mr. Ross was made vice-president of the Nickel Plate at a salary of $50,000 a year for five years.

The next step was the acquisition of the Lake Erie and Western Railroad. It was purchased from the New York Central for $3,000,000, of which $500,000 was in cash. At the same time, however, the New York Central lent the Van Sweringens $2,500,000 on their equity in their previous purchase of Nickel Plate, thus increasing by $2,000,000 their bank account instead of decreasing it in making this purchase. Later on some additional stock in the Lake Erie and Western was acquired. O. P. Van Sweringen testified that the above-mentioned purchases together with additional shares of Clover Leaf and Nickel Plate stock had cost about $6,000,000. Thus by 1922 the Van Sweringens had acquired control of the Nickel Plate, the Clover Leaf, and the Lake Erie and Western for a total of $21,000,000, financed with less than $520,000 in cash—otherwise out of the treasuries of the railroads themselves and loans.

In April, 1923, the consolidation of these three railroads was effected under State law without application to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Van Sweringens exchanged their old stock in the three railways for shares in the new Nickel Plate, 188,286 preferred and 191,700 common. The preferred stock was sold for $15,000,000. The Van Sweringens also sold all of the common stock other than that necessary to give them a bare control, realizing for it almost $2,000,000 more. This left them with a little more than half of the voting stock at a cost of $3,744,691. The value of this stock at the time was $29,000,000.

By this time the Van Sweringens were in no mood to return to their former occupation of delivering newspapers and in August, 1924, it was announced that these two brothers from the hinterland proposed a merger of the Nickel Plate, the Erie, the Pere Marquette, the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Hocking Valley railroads. When the announcement was made the Vaness Company had already acquired enough stock in the Erie, Pere Marquette, and Chesapeake and Ohio to carry through the unification. As the Chesapeake and Ohio owned 80 per cent of the Hocking Valley stock, that railroad was already looked after. Naturally the purchases necessary to effect the merger were not made with cash. Temporary loans were obtained from J. P. Morgan and Company, the First National Bank of New York, and the Guaranty Trust Company of the same city. Some were later liquidated by a bond issue on the part of the Nickel Plate for $26,000,000. The cost to the Nickel Plate of the blocks of the Chesapeake and Ohio and Pere Marquette stock bought by that railroad was $17,902,648. Control of the Chesapeake and Ohio was not, however, exercised by stock ownership but by interlocking directorates authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission on a promise that the Nickel Plate would not acquire a majority interest.

QUICK ACTION

What followed is an example of what O. P. Van Sweringen must have had in mind when he remarked that when he saw an opportunity he tried to act quickly. On the afternoon of January 22, 1923, at the close of the hearing, it was intimated that the application for the interlocking directorates would be granted. On January 23 the Van Sweringens exercised an option from the Huntington estate to purchase 73,000 shares of Chesapeake and Ohio common for $7,300,000. On January 26 the board of directors of the Nickel Plate authorized its officers to spend $7,000,000 in the purchase of Chesapeake and Ohio stock. All this was before the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission was actually handed down on January 27.

About this time loud grumbling began to be heard from Chesapeake and Ohio stockholders. Seeing that a fight was inevitable the Vaness Company went into the market and bought enough more stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio to give it control. The Vaness Company's acquisitions of Erie, Pere Marquette, and Chesapeake and Ohio had now cost a total of $30,680,000 in addition to the purchases by the Nickel Plate from the bond issue. As this stock was to be converted into new company stock, estimated to be worth $47,203,680, it will be seen that the Van Sweringens were not to suffer a loss in the effort to protect their property. If now as a result of the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission the brothers propose a new unification giving better terms to the Chesapeake and Ohio stockholders, they themselves will be the chief beneficiaries of such liberality, and their gains on Chesapeake holdings will probably more than offset their loss on Erie and on Nickel Plate if they simply stand pat.

By a peculiar feature of the merger plan it was provided that the Nickel Plate Company should not give up its Chesapeake or Pere Marquette stock or the $22,000,000 of its own full-paid stock in its treasury, nor any other treasury asset, to the new Nickel Plate company, but should assume all indebtedness, including the bond issue out of which the stock was purchased. Summing up these items, one arrives at a total of more than $50,000,000 which was to be held out from the common pot by the Nickel Plate. As the Vaness Company owns 54 per cent of the common stock of the Nickel Plate its share in these assets would have been about $27,000,000. The Vaness Company's paper profit on its own stock was to be about $16,500,000. Hence, we arrive at a total profit to the Vaness Company through stock manipulation of $43,500,000.

$80,000,000 OF PROFITS

Thus we see that the Vaness Company, outside of the former Nickel Plate consolidation, is to be credited with potential profits of $30,000,000 in the Cleveland terminal. In the manipulation of stocks in order to lay the basis for the proposed merger there was a profit of $43,500,000 more, or a total of $73,500,000. The Van Sweringens, as owners of 80 per cent of the Vaness stock, share to the extent of about $59,000,000, but they are also to be credited with a profit of about $20,000,000 on their old Nickel Plate consolidation and of some additional sums, bringing the total well above $80,000,000. These stock profits were made largely by favoring their own holdings against others'.

But of more importance than the huge profits taken out of these railways is the fact that the Van Sweringens have consistently maintained control of common stock while letting the public put up the actual money through purchase of bonds and preferred stock without voting power. At the apex of a complicated pyramid of interlocking control is the common stock of the Vaness Company, all of which is deposited under a voting-trust agreement.

The managers of the trust are vested with the exclusive voting rights of the Vaness Company no matter who may own the certificates. The Van Sweringens exercise 80 per cent of the voting rights of these managers. The other rights are in the hands of Messrs. Nutt and Bradley. It is further provided that this extraordinary trust agreement is to continue for twenty-one years after the death of the last survivor of the four men named.

It was this possible control divorced from ownership—in the opinion of many, including Van Sweringen counsel—that was most responsible for the merger's defeat.

The War in Passaic

By MARY HEATON VORSE

The annual report of the Botany and Garfield Worsted Mills of April 21, 1925, showed net earnings of $2,229,550, a net credit to surplus of $1,731,298, and distributable earnings of $5.91 a share on class A stock and $1.91 a share on common stock.

THE strike of the textile workers in Passaic, New Jersey, is a strike of hunger. It is the direct result of a 10 per cent slash in wages already far below a level of decent living. The pay of the textile workers is the lowest in American industry. They get from $12 to $22 a week. Heads of families work for $20, $17.50, and $15. It seems incredible that wages as low as these should have been cut by companies whose mills are among the richest in the country. But that is what happened. That is what has sent ten thousand textile workers streaming out of the mills. That is why after weeks of strike the picket line numbers thousands. That is why processions of workers march from Passaic to Garfield and Clifton singing. Never has a strike of such small numbers shown such mass picketing and such parades. Half the picket line is composed of young people. Mothers with children by the hand, older women and high-school boys and girls stream along, their heads thrown back, singing "Solidarity forever, the union makes us strong" to the tune of "John Brown's Body." The singing picket line has hope in it. Passaic sprawling in its winter slush and snow watches its mill-workers make a full-hearted protest against the intolerable conditions in the mills, against the inhuman and unbearable wage cut.

During the first weeks of the strike the numbers of strikers rolled up like a snowball. The Botany Mill came out first. One mill after another joined the strikers until nearly all the mills were involved. One day they formed a parade of twelve thousand to march from Passaic into Clifton. What a parade! Processions of baby carriages, bands of youngsters, older women, an old grandma of eighty-one. The undimmed, enthusiastic mill children, the youngsters in their teens.

This peaceful parade was set upon by the police as they tried to cross a bridge marching from one town to another. Clubbings of such brutal nature occurred that the daily press was filled with pictures of prostrate strikers and policemen with riot clubs in air. This clubbing did not dim their spirit. The big parade gave them a sense of power and solidarity. They had been striking against the wage cut—only that. Now they voiced demands: a 10 per cent increase over the old wage scale, the return of money taken from them by wage cut, time and a half for overtime, a forty-hour week, decent sanitary working conditions, no discrimination against union workers, and recognition of the union. Then came a further triumph, the Forstmann-Huffmann Mills with their four thousand workers joined the walk-out.

The outside world began to notice the strike. Noted ministers, writers, representatives of labor organizations, supporters of civil liberties streamed into Passaic. The town of Garfield invited the strikers to a meeting and the city council indorsed the strikers' demands completely, the only dissenting voices being those of the mayor and the chief of police.

At the beginning of the sixth week the mayor of Passaic menaced the strikers with a force of three hundred mounted policemen. This proved to be only a bugaboo. The picket line, two thousand strong, was practically unmolested, while the aged horses upon which a few policemen were mounted brought laughter from the crowd. Again the strikers formed a parade in the afternoon and marched into Garfield. Throughout all these demonstrations perfect order was preserved.

Then the authorities decided to break the peace. With tear bombs, mounted patrolmen, and a company of sixty-five foot police they tried to disperse a crowd of 2,000 strikers. They failed. The workers jeered and laughed at them. But finally, with the help of five fire companies battering the crowd with powerful streams of water the guardians of order broke the ranks of the strikers, smashing them with clubs when they attempted to halt in their flight or to reform their ranks. The next day the police did better still. They charged a crowd of 3,000 strikers, bludgeoned many men, women, and children, and smashed with deliberate intent the persons and cameras of the news photographers and motion-picture men present. That was their last victory. The strikers, armed with gas masks, helmets, and their unbending courage, defied the police successfully—and paraded in peace. Photographers took pictures through the slits in armored cars or from the safe vantage of a swooping airplane. The authorities were, temporarily at least, confounded. As a result of the disorders of the week Justice of the Peace Katz issued warrants for the arrest of Chief of Police Zober and two patrolmen charged with clubbing orderly and inoffensive men and women. To the date of writing warrants are still hovering over the heads of these guardians of the public peace; none of their fellow-officers can be induced to serve them. Meantime the fight goes on and the picket line, an army of thousands, defies the police and greets the few remaining workers when the mill gates open.

The present Passaic strike is only a phase of the long fight of the textile workers for organization and a living wage. These million people who weave our cloth have always lived on the fringe of destitution. Employed by some of the richest corporations in America, their poverty is a by-word. The conditions under which they live is a disgrace to this rich country. We are indicted, tried, and condemned by our textile workers. From time to time they remind us of this fact by a strike.

Fourteen years ago all of us who saw the strike in Lawrence were horrified at the conditions we found. Heads of families were working for $9, for $12. People lived in dwellings that were no better than rat-holes. It was then that Vida Scudder, professor in Wellesley College, stated that the women of this country would refuse to wear cloth manufactured under such conditions if they knew the price in human life being paid for it.

Now after fourteen years we see people whose real wages are but little higher than those of Lawrence days. We see them living in tenements so ill-ventilated, in rooms so dark with walls that sweat so much moisture that the tenements of New York seem pleasant, airy places in comparison. Even in 1912 the laws of Massachusetts prevented some of the scandalous conditions of Passaic. Children under sixteen were not allowed to work in the mills. Passaic children of fourteen are permitted to work an eight-hour day. Night work for women was not permitted in Massachusetts. In Passaic we have the spectacle of hundreds upon hundreds of women, the most overburdened of all the population, the mothers of large families, forced by their husbands' low wages to work in the mills. These women, who may have six, seven, and eight children, go to work at night. They work for ten hours a night, five nights a week. They have no dinner hour. At midnight a recess of fifteen minutes is accorded them. They return home in the morning to get the children off to school and to do the housework. Most of them have children under school age as well and these they must attend to during the day—rest or no rest.

It is this night-work in the mills that marks the difference between the bright-looking, eager girls and the dragged, hopeless, tired older faces which one sees, faces blurred by fatigue. The bearing of many children, the constant fight against poverty, the existence in overcrowded, unaired rooms, the long, grilling, inhuman hours of night-work make these women's lives a nightmare of fatigue.

A law was passed by the legislature of New Jersey forbidding night-work of women. A group of women mill workers appeared at Trenton and begged to have this law repealed. Of course they did. How can a family of nine people live on $20? Of course these women will clamor to be allowed to kill themselves with night-work rather than forego the pittance which they make.

The recent wage cut was written in terms of life and death. The textile workers live so near the margin of destitution that 10 per cent taken from them means undernourishment and disease and eventually death. The men and women in Passaic have met the conditions imposed on them with heroism and have tried for their children's sake to make good homes out of nothing. In the miserable dark rooms in which they live you will find bright hangings, touching bunches of gay paper flowers, often spotless cleanliness, always an attempt at beauty. Through their strike the textile workers have again questioned our civilization.

It would be impossible for any right-thinking man or woman to go into the homes of Passaic and talk to the women who work on the night shift without feeling that a personal responsibility had been laid upon him or her. When there is such want and suffering, when conditions of toil are so degrading, when the places that human beings live in are so indecent it becomes the concern of the public at large to make its power felt and to see that this state of things is altered.

The Democrats Stand by Mellon

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, D. C., March 6

ONE of the things that still puzzles the unsophisticated at this session of Congress is the curious supineness, the amazing inertia of the Democrats in the Senate in matters affecting Mr. Mellon. It is conceded that one of the functions of the minority party is to pick flaws in the majority, to seize upon its weaknesses, to hit it in the vulnerable spots. Vigilance along these lines not only serves a party purpose but by keeping the dominant majority from becoming too cock-sure and confident actually serves the country too. It helps keep them honest.

Up to date Mr. Mellon unquestionably has been one of the great assets of the Coolidge Administration and the Republican Party. More than any other agency or individual, he has solidified back of Mr. Coolidge the journalistic, banking, and business support upon which his prestige is built and which prevents the public from taking his real measure as a man. Not many dispute that.

It would seem reasonable and natural for the Democrats to take what legitimate openings are presented to discount the idea that Mr. Mellon is a sacred and shining figure, beyond fear and above reproach, whose heroic self-sacrifice and financial genius make him the "greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Hamilton." But when the chance has come they have singularly failed to avail themselves of it. They have not only failed to look for opportunities to spoil this beautiful picture themselves but when opportunity, initiative, evidence, and facts are supplied by Senatorial members of Mr. Mellon's own party, regular Republicans in good standing, the Democratic leaders have sat in their seats and failed to follow through or even to offer the least assistance.

Some have, without analysis and without answer to Senator Couzens's charges, many of which never have been answered, indicated their support of Mr. Mellon and their belief that it is outrageous to say these things about such a good and great man. Others have shaken deprecatory heads at Senators Couzens and Norris when they assailed the Secretary, and indicated sympathy with the remarks of the official Mellon defender, Senator Reed of Pennsylvania, even on the remarkable occasion when that gentleman, misunderstanding the charges, made an eloquent speech convicting the Mellon banks of evading a $91,000 payment while under the impression he was exonerating them.

With the exception of Senator Walsh, not a Democratic Senator this session has raised his voice in outright criticism of the Secretary of the Treasury. The real criticism has come from Republicans, Senators Couzens and Norris, and while it has been given little prominence in the newspapers, the allegations made have certainly been of a kind to justify some attention. For example, Couzens has charged that the largest refund made to any individual was $400,000 to Mr. Mellon personally, that huge allowances were made irregularly for corporations and the banks controlled by the Mellon interests, that rulings by which rich newspaper publishers supporting the Administration have escaped payment of many thousands have been made improperly, that favoritism has been shown great oil companies by which they have escaped assessment on many millions.

These and other things have been charged openly by Couzens as a result of his investigation of the Internal Revenue Bureau. Some of them have been answered by the Treasury, some by Senator Reed, some not at all. But in no instance have the Democrats thought it worth while to give Senator Couzens even passive support. He has fought practically a single-handed fight without newspaper sympathy or support, with his own party hostile, the other party passive, and a suit for $10,000,000 back taxes swung at him by the Treasury after he made his first charges against the bureau.

When you consider the odds against him, there is really something heroic in the Couzens fight. Whatever you may think of his judgment or the merits of his charges, it is impossible not to admire his courage. Nor is it possible to dismiss him as a demagogue. He happens, besides being a Republican, to be a highly successful business man and is, next to Mr. Mellon, the richest individual holding public office in America today.

As for the Democrats it is doubtful whether any minority party ever before played such a role as theirs today in the Senate toward Mr. Mellon. Privately they assert forcefully enough their belief that Couzens has done a good job and ought to get more credit. Privately they say that Mr. Mellon's services and Mr. Mellon's capacity are tremendously overrated and that the idea that he is a wonderful official is all moonshine and propaganda. But publicly they do not say these things. On the contrary, they deprecate the blunt attack of Republican Senator Couzens and Republican Senator Norris against the Republican Secretary of the Treasury.

It is a singular situation. Various explanations to account for the attitude of individual Democratic Senators are offered. In one instance a social connection and a personal tie are said to be the cause of a pro-Mellon feeling. In another, a Southern Senator, not previously well fixed financially, made a couple of hundred thousand dollars in real estate during the recess last year, and this has had an amazingly conservatizing influence on him. It has made him feel as if he were part and parcel of the interests against which he used to inveigh. With several other Senators the location in their States of large Mellon plants, directed by dominant and powerful local men, is regarded as a softening influence.

But none of these is the real reason. One important explanation is the awe inspired by the tremendous wealth of the man and the certainty that any criticism of him, no matter what the grounds, will not be credited by the public and will be resented hotly by the newspapers and the business and professional elements which have placed him on a pedestal.

The other reason—and that is the most powerful of all—is a singularly simple one. It is this: The bulk of the Democratic Senators, as well as the Republican Senators, in the last two years have had to go to the Internal Revenue Bureau time and again in the interests of influential individuals or interests in their States who wanted an exemption for this or an allowance for that.

The bulk of the Democrats, as well as the Republicans, have been asking and receiving favors from the Internal Revenue Bureau. Not one of them knows when he will be forced to go there and ask for more. Almost any question can be decided by the bureau in three or four different ways—all legal. One of these ways saves a man or a firm a lot of money, and the others do not.

It is not necessary to pursue the subject. It ought to be easy for anyone to see why many Democratic Senators feel in no position to join with Senators Couzens and Norris in their assaults on the Internal Revenue Bureau. Seeing his elaborate and carefully built-up case fall flat and the crowd from whom he expected support look the other way, it is no wonder Senator Couzens ruefully shakes his head and says, "Give me control of the Internal Revenue Bureau and I will run the politics of the whole darn country."

Some here express the situation in another way. There is, they say, no longer a Democratic and a Republican Party in the Senate. There is now a Mellon party and a small anti-Mellon party, composed not of Democrats but of the little group of independent Republicans, Progressives, and Senator Walsh. That is about the situation.

The Great Steel City

By BARBARA BIBER

Rain drips through the fingertips of the steel city,
The tired raindrops are singing a melody in blue,
Wearied and lonely.

The steel city flexes the muscles in her fingertips,
And a man slips like an eel from a scaffold,
Wearied and lonely.

The city's tongue is hoisted to speak
And the boats on the river sink to the bottom,
Wearied and lonely.

The steel city winks its great right eye to the twilight,
And the soothing blue ignites into scorching red,
Tired and wearied.

The great steel city
Is beyond itself.
It is lost in the myriads of numbers.

The great steel city
Has grown too strong.
It is afraid to move its fingers.

The great steel city
Can no longer speak,
The derricks are too weak for her tongue.

The great steel city
Must live alone,
It fears to wink at the twilight.

The great steel city
Wants to laugh aloud,
But it fears.

Past and Future in the Philippines

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

Manila, January 25

IN the Philippines the past of Asia, in which white men built empires, and the future, in which the colored races will rule themselves, are at war.

The United States came into these islands twenty-five years ago with a mixture of imperial self-confidence and ultra-democratic idealism. We had no settled imperial policy, and while we ardently and atrociously suppressed immediate attempts at Filipino independence, we told them that it was all for their good; and, oddly, we meant it. Governor Taft proceeded to talk about "the Philippines for the Filipinos"; a succession of Presidents assured the Filipinos that they would have independence as soon as they were ready for it, hinting that the day would come soon; we enacted the conservationist land laws which so annoy the rubber men today; we established schools all over the islands and introduced the islanders to Patrick Henry crying "Liberty or death," to the Declaration of Independence, to Daniel Webster, and to Abraham Lincoln. We built roads, developed the port of Manila, introduced measures of sanitation theretofore unknown in the Orient, promoted baseball as a substitute for cock-fighting, put shirts and trousers on some of those who had, in the tropical manner, preferred less, and established a neat little framework of a Western democratic government.

The astonished Filipinos absorbed the lesson rapidly, and soon began shouting for "immediate, complete, and absolute independence." We did not grant that, but we sent them a governor general who believed in it, and Congress passed the Jones bill, which was a sort of charter of self-government. It had many ambiguous clauses, but Governor Harrison interpreted it to mean that the Filipinos should run their own government, and they did. When he arrived in Manila in 1913, 28 per cent of the public offices were filled by Americans; when he left in 1921 the figure had been reduced to 4 per cent, and Filipinos occupied every cabinet office but one.

About that time two things happened: the bottom fell out of the world market, and General Leonard Wood arrived in the Philippines. Sugar, hemp, cocoanut oil, and copra constitute three-quarters of the Philippine exports, and sugar alone accounts for nearly a third. Now, in 1921, the average value of a 100-pound sack of sugar dropped to just 30 per cent of what it had been in 1920; the value of hemp fell 50 per cent, and of copra and cocoanut oil 40 per cent. The United States was also in the doldrums, and by our tariff laws we had made the United States the overwhelmingly dominant market for the Philippine Islands. In 1921 the United States, feeling poor, bought less than one-fifth as many Manila cigars as in 1920, and cigars are the only other large export of the islands. To the Philippines these events were more catastrophic than it would be for the United States if the entire European market were wiped out.

Under Governor Harrison the Filipinos had done more than govern themselves; they had indulged in a little experiment in state socialism. They had founded, with government capital, the Philippine National Bank; they had bought out the Manila Railroad; they had established a government coal company, a government cement plant, and a series of government-financed sugar centrals. If the high prices of 1918-1920 had continued these experiments might have been known to the historians as examples of far-visioned statesmanship; but the bottom dropped out of the market, and accordingly they are cited as evidences of Filipino incapacity for handling business and government.

Now, the Filipinos had done these things not because they had any interest in the theories of Karl Marx but because the national interest suggested them. The Filipinos saw no reason why all the bank profits made in the islands should go to New York financiers who preferred to lend money to men of their own race and color; they did not like the British management of their railway; they thought the price of imported coal and cement too high, and hoped to develop their own resources. Whatever their reasons, a combination of circumstances worked against them. The bank was carelessly managed; all the enterprises borrowed money too lavishly, and when the bottom dropped out of the market they looked extremely sick.

Leonard Wood and Cameron Forbes, governor-to-be and ex-governor, arrived in the islands in the spring of 1921, made a whirlwind tour, and reported that almost everything Governor Harrison had done was wrong. He had given the islands too much self-government, so that the morale of the services had run down, they said, and in particular he had encouraged these horrible socialistic enterprises. The governor general must have more power, they insisted, and the Philippine Government must get itself out of business.

The Filipinos did not like either recommendation. Allied with congressional inertia they were able to stop any additional grant of power from Washington; and they clung to their pet Philippine enterprises. Governor Wood, they said, wanted to sell their country to the Wall Street capitalists. In this, of course there was an element of truth: Governor Wood has a horror of government in business, and believed that the only hope for the enterprises was to put them in the hands of experienced American business men. The bank, upon audit, appeared to have lost all of its capital and most of its deposits; but its doors are still open. Five years after Governor Wood's arrival it is still advancing money to the sugar planters in the hope that prices will some day go up again so that it can recover its frozen assets. One of the sugar centrals is making money; the others are still losing. The railroad has begun to pay dividends; but the coal company still loses, and even Manuel Quezon is now ready to sell the cement plant. (A new and more ardent left wing, headed by Mr. Tomas Confesor, is, however, denouncing the proposed sale.) In all these undertakings there was discovered plain evidence of incompetence and reckless speculation, and some dishonesty. All this is constantly cited as proof of Filipino incapacity for self-government. It is quite true that the Filipinos lack men of experience in corporate administration and large-scale finance; it is also true, as they point out, that some of the heaviest losses of the bank were suffered in its Shanghai branch, which was managed by Americans; and some of them recall the history of the Bank of the United States.

Governor Wood, unable to persuade the Filipinos to sell their pet projects, proceeded patiently to help them to clean up. For the first year or two things went reasonably well. But the Governor had certain fixed ideas of constitutional procedure upon which it proved impossible to agree. The Jones bill said that the governor had "supreme executive authority"; it also said that the legislature had "general legislative powers." Under Governor Harrison the legislature had passed bills taking control of subordinate officials out of the hands of the governor general. Governor Wood believed such legislation unconstitutional and therefore void. Friction grew, and finally, over the miserable Conley case, came the "crisis" of 1923. Conley was an American detective on the Manila police force. His record was not spotless, but his real crime appeared to be catching relatives of politicians. He was tried for bribery and acquitted—twice—of the specific charge against him. The Filipino officials refused to reinstate him; the Governor insisted that any law denying his right to reinstate Conley was unconstitutional, and he reinstated him. Thereupon the entire Council of State, consisting of the president of the Senate, the speaker of the House, and the cabinet secretaries, resigned. The Governor accepted their resignations, and has since been carrying on with the under-secretaries. (Some say that these, being civil-service men rather than political appointees, are preferable to the old.)

The fight was on. The Governor vetoed bills galore. He vetoed 31 of the 84 bills passed at the 1923-1924 session; he vetoed 24 of the 72 passed at the last session. Many of these were excellent vetoes; some were recommended by the acting department secretaries. Several were, I think, silly vetoes, such as the veto of a bill changing the name of the town Duero to Wilson, and that of a bill which, while retaining adultery as the sole ground of divorce, would have made it unnecessary for a man to prosecute and convict his wife in open court before he was entitled to sue for divorce. It should be said in the Governor's favor that the non-cooperation policy pursued by the Filipinos made it impossible for him to suggest amendments while bills were still under discussion, and that a flood of bills is regularly dumped on his desk after the legislature has already adjourned. The next battle came when the insular auditor, another Washington appointee, declared the annual million-peso appropriation for the Philippine Independence Commission unconstitutional, thereby felling one of the favorite Filipino plum-trees. Many unfair charges, however, have been published about the extravagances of these commissions. They never spent their million pesos in any year and seldom spent half of them; and, by a curious American joke, the expenses of the Woods-Forbes commission were actually charged against the Independence fund! "There didn't seem to be any other funds available," said the insular auditor.

I leave Manila with a heightened respect for Governor Wood's quality. He knows the islands as few men know them; he loves them; he has their interests at heart. He is an able, devoted administrator; but he is not a great educator, and our task is not merely to govern these islands but to train them for self-government. Today, however wise Governor Wood's vetoes and suggestions for administrative reform may be, the Filipinos are irritated into opposing them. Governor Wood does not transfer his wisdom to them. He is, in a way, a tragic figure—stranded out here, and unsuccessful even here. His face is set in deep, disappointed lines. He has his code—a military code—of honor, and he is sticking to it wearily. He has lost hope of a personal future and is just doggedly trying to finish a job.

Part of his difficulty lies in the men who surround him. Since the "crisis" he has depended for advice upon a group of army officers; and military men, especially when they come from the South, think there is only one way to deal with colored races. Military men, too—including Governor Wood—have little patience with the foibles of democracies. The Filipinos have been promised independence when they achieve a "stable government." And this is the way in which Governor Wood once defined that little phrase:

A stable government means civic courage, courts of justice which give equal opportunities to the senator as well as to the simple tao, resources ready for disposal at any moment they are needed by the country, organization which will enable the country to defend its integrity, adequate hospitals all over the islands which are not found in the provinces we have just visited, social organization which shows keen human interest in the protection of the needy and the poor, effective public sanitation, common language, and many others.

What government in the world, on that definition, is stable?

This winter two new bombshells burst: President Coolidge's message to Congress recommending an increase in the powers of the governor general; and the rubber propaganda to retain the islands forever. There has always been a movement, sponsored by the American Chamber of Commerce in the Philippines (whose secretary, incidentally, is the Manila correspondent of the Chicago Daily News), to annex the islands, but until this year of inflated rubber prices it did not much alarm the Filipinos. Today they are afraid; they begin to question the good faith of the United States; and when Mr. Coolidge's message came the two parties which had been fighting each other suddenly downed arms and formed a coalition* to fight as one for the threatened cause of their country's independence.

As a matter of fact they have not been in a great hurry for independence. They want to be sure of it, and they want it in their own lifetime. If the choice is between now and never, they will choose now. They will always vote for it now. But they know that only a part of their people has yet caught up with the twentieth century, that they are still only 40 per cent literate (which is better than Spain), and privately, in confidential conversation, they plead for a continued friendly connection with the United States. They cite the example of Canada and Great Britain. They hope that the United States will always have a special interest in them; and when an outline of the proposed Barrows bill was published, suggesting that they pay for the fortifications erected by the United States in their territory, lose their tariff and immigration privileges, and in general cut totally loose, they were appalled. In the background is still a vast mass of accumulated good-will. We have not exploited these islands—although the prevailing American idea of our benevolence is a bit exaggerated. (Filipino revenues have paid for all the "American" improvements here, except for a famine gift of $3,000,000 in 1903 and the cost of the army.) The people, in the mass, like Americans. Ride through the little banana-and-cocanut villages of the interior, and hear the chorus of "Hello, Americano" that sweeps from the window of one nipa-palm hut to the next if you doubt it. They still like us. Will they always?

* The "coalition pact" signed by the two Filipino parties was published in the International Relations Section of last week's issue.

It is in the most backward districts that we are best liked. And it is the most backward peoples whom the colonial Americans most praise. An American officer's wife bared the reason when she said:

The Moros and the mountain people have breeding. They have a sense of rank and of class distinctions. They know what discipline means—their tribal head-men give orders which are instantly obeyed, and the American governor is to them simply the big head-man, to be obeyed as unquestioningly as their own chiefs. Filipinos (the lowland 90 per cent of the population) lack that recognition of authority. They think themselves as good as any man, and always want to argue. Admitting no man's superiority, they are habitually discourteous and insolent.

What too many Americans in these islands want are docile servants. The spirit of democracy they call "insolence." They believe in caste and class and race lines, and they are at no pains to conceal their feelings from the Filipinos. "All lowland Filipinos are lazy, incompetent liars," said one grouchy American at dinner, while his Filipino boy stood behind him, drinking in every word. Many American women will not dance with a man who has danced with Filipino women; he becomes in their eyes, a "squaw man." Two handsome clubs of tropical luxury dominate the Luneta, the center of the new Manila. No Filipino ever enters the Elks Club except as a servant; and, with rare exceptions, the same is true of that hotbed of race patriotism, the Army and Navy Club. The people in the back country do not know these things; they do not care—yet. But as the flood of graduates emerges from the schools each year, as the number grows of young men accustomed to wear white linen suits, who believe themselves the equal of other men, just as they have been taught in American textbooks, the gulf between Americans and Filipinos widens. Inevitably the Filipino resents contempt for his race: inevitably he tries to shove out the white-faced man and put a brown face "just as good" in his place.

All the white men of the Eastern empires dread Filipino independence. They do not want a free nation of colored people to rise in their midst and smash to bits the ancient fable of the white man's burden. They want to stay forever, ruling these rich Eastern empires, "for the good of the natives," even if it means killing thousands of them. And the Americans in these islands have been infected.

We have almost done what no white nation has yet done in history—trained a dark people in freedom, and set it free. The rubber men and the chambers of commerce have filled the world with doubts of our good faith. In the interest of American honor as well as of the Filipinos we must make our purpose clear. Shall we set this people free? And when? We had almost marched into the future; but today we seem to be slipping into the dead ruts of the past.

Poe's Idea of Beauty*

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

POE'S body of critical doctrine, first suggested in a preface to the 1831 volume of poems, developed piecemeal in various critiques, and finally rather completely summarized in "The Philosophy of Composition" and "The Poetic Principle," may be briefly stated as follows:

The world of literature is essentially a hierarchy. At the bottom are the realistic works based upon "that evil genius of mere matter of fact" against whose "groveling and degrading assumptions" it is the duty of the critic to fight with every weapon in his power. The middle ground is occupied by that species of prose tale in which the artist, "having conceived, with deliberate care, a certain unique or single effect to be wrought out, combines such events as may best aid him in establishing this preconceived effect," while at the top stands the true poem, which may be defined as the rhythmical creation of beauty.

Man is born with an instinct for this thing called beauty and in the world of nature he finds much to satisfy it. "And just as the lily is repeated in the lake, or the eyes of Amaryllis in the mirror, so is the mere oral or written repetition of these forms and sounds and colors and odors and sentiments a duplicate source of delight." Such description is not, however, real poetry, because it concerns itself only with the actual and attainable.

He who shall simply sing, with however glowing enthusiasm or with however vivid a truth of description, of the sights and sounds and odors and colors and sentiments which greet him in common with all mankind—he, I say, has yet failed to prove his divine title. There is still a something in the distance which he has been unable to attain. We have still a thirst unquenchable, to allay which he has not shown us the crystal springs. This thirst belongs to the immortality of Man. It is the desire of the moth for the star. It is no mere appreciation of the Beauty before us—but a wild effort to reach the Beauty above. Inspired by an ecstatic prescience of the glories beyond the grave, we struggle, by multiform combinations among the things and thoughts of Time, to attain a portion of that Loveliness whose very elements, perhaps, appertain to eternity alone.

Because this beauty is by definition unrealizable a certain indefiniteness is one of its attributes, and thus "Music is the perfection of the soul, or idea, of poetry. The vagueness of exaltation aroused by a sweet air (which should be strictly indefinite and never too strongly suggestive) is precisely what we should aim at in poetry." "Affectation, within bounds, is . . . no blemish," but since "ideality" is the supreme attribute of poetry it must never even when dealing with its chief subject, love, be concerned to any great extent with passion. "It is precisely this 'unpassionate emotion' which is the limit of the true poetical art. Passion proper and poetry are discordant. Poetry, in elevating, tranquilizes the soul. With the heart it has nothing to do." "This [poetic] Principle itself is, strictly and simply, the Human Aspiration for Supernal Beauty, the manifestation of the Principle is always found in an elevating excitement of the soul—quite independent of that passion which is the intoxication of the Heart—or of that Truth which is the satisfaction of the Reason. For, in regard to Passion, alas! its tendency is to degrade, rather than to elevate the Soul. Love, on the contrary—Love—the true, the divine Eros—the Uranian, as distinguished from the Dionæan Venus—is unquestionably the purest and truest of all poetic themes.” “A passionate poem is a contradiction in terms.”

* This article is an extract from "Edgar Allan Poe: A Study in Genius," to be published by Alfred A. Knopf. Mr. Krutch attempts to demonstrate that Poe's poems and stories are an imaginative adjustment to the two dominant facts of Poe's personality: a neurotic sense of inferiority and a psychic sexual incapacity. In the present section he considers Poe's critical theory in relation to these same factors and suggests the general problems which are raised by the psychological method of criticism.

It is impossible that the soul should remain in this state of elevation for more than a short time. “All high excitements are necessarily transient. Thus a long poem is a paradox. And, without unity of impression, the deepest effects cannot be brought about. Epics were the offspring of an imperfect sense of art.” “‘Paradise Lost’ is to be regarded as poetical only when, losing sight of that vital requisite in all works of Art, Unity, we view it merely as a series of minor poems. If, to preserve its Unity—its totality of effort or impression—we read it (as would be necessary) at a single sitting, the result is but a constant alternation of excitement and depression. After a passage of what we feel to be true poetry, there follows, inevitably, a passage of platitude which no critical pre-judgment can force us to admire; but if, upon completing the work, we read it again; omitting the first book—that is to say, commencing with the second—we shall be surprised at now finding that admirable which we before condemned—that damnable which we had previously so much admired.” Finally, “all experience has shown” that in the highest manifestations of Beauty the “tone is one of sadness. Beauty of whatever kind, in its supreme development, invariably excites the sensitive soul to tears. Melancholy is thus the most legitimate of all the poetic tones.” “This certain taint of sadness is inseparably connected with all the higher manifestations of true Beauty.”

As a result of this analysis of the attributes of supreme beauty it should be possible to discover one subject which satisfies more completely than any other all the requirements, and such is indeed the case:

Now, never losing sight of the object supremeness, or perfection, at all points, I asked myself—“Of all melancholy topics, what, according to the universal understanding of mankind, is the most melancholy?” Death—was the obvious reply. “And when,” I said, “is this most melancholy of topics most poetical?” From what I have already explained at some length, the answer, here also is obvious—“When it most closely allies itself to Beauty”: the death, then, of a beautiful woman, is, unquestionably, the most poetical topic in the world.”

In considering this body of doctrine one cannot but be struck, first of all, by the remarkable appearance of logical completeness which it presents, for once its premises are granted the conclusions are drawn with the same elaborate clarity which is characteristic of Poe’s ratiocinative tales. In the second place, it is evident that they do contain certain elements of truth. The definition of beauty does at least describe very clearly a kind of beauty, and thus though the doctrines may not have the universality claimed for them, they do succeed in doing in their own way all that the best set of critical principles has ever done, which is, not to lay down the laws which govern all art but to define, as accurately as is possible, a style. Yet it is certainly a work of supererogation to point out that this definition is merely a description of the effect which Poe himself was endeavoring to produce, and since his art was the result of an unrecognized and uncontrollable need, it must follow that the criticism is, like the thing criticized, the product not of the abstract reason of which Poe was so proud but of the forces which led him into a system of rationalization which became ever more complex.

The sources of his criticism have been frequently discussed. It has often been stated that his master was Coleridge and the statement is true—in so far as he had any master except himself. Thus in the preface to the 1831 volume the central doctrine was expressed as follows: “A poem, in my opinion, is opposed to a work of science by having, for its immediate object, pleasure, not truth.” If we compare this with the statement of Coleridge that “A poem is that species of composition which is opposed to works of science, by proposing for its immediate object not truth,” it will appear that Poe’s only contribution is to be found in the phrase “in my opinion.” Yet it is not to be supposed that the youthful poet, after a thorough course of study in aesthetics, had decided to make his works conform to the theories of Coleridge. Nothing is more characteristic of his mind than the pertinacity with which he held to a useful phrase or a fact upon which he had chanced to fall, and he needed no more than a hint such as he got in this sentence from Coleridge or in Bacon’s dictum concerning beauty and strangeness to set him off upon a line of thought which led him through numerous by-paths until it seemed to cover the universe. Coleridge’s remark was true because there was need to defend his non-moral art in a country where literature was generally considered the handmaiden of utilitarian ethics, just as Bacon’s was true because the beauty which Poe himself created had always that element of strangeness. Taking the two together he could prove that his own work was pure and perfect, and the hidden spring of energy behind his critical writing was the desire to do just that.

What had been said of the central principle of his aesthetic may be said with equal truth of all its details. It may be, as has been suggested, that his idea of brevity as essential to a true poem was taken from Schlegel, but the fact that he was himself incapable of sustained effort is surely of more significance in accounting for the existence of the idea than any German source whatsoever. So too his assertion that the highest beauty is always passionless and always melancholy is less the result of a logical deduction than of the fact that to him passion was always repellent and the highest pleasure shadowed by sadness. Because he did not himself realize what it was that he sought, a vagueness like music is inseparable from the highest poetry, and, finally and most specifically, because only unattainable women could move without maddening him, “The most poetic of all ideas is the death of a beautiful woman.”

Poe’s criticism is, then, as intensely personal as his poetry or his fiction. Beauty as he defines it includes nothing except beauty of the sort which he himself produced. And the primary value of the criticism is as an interpretation, not of literature in general but of his own works.

It must be remembered, moreover, that however true this interpretation may be upon the level of art it is upon the level of psychology either false or at least misleading. The logic with which he supports his principles is not the product of a free mind but an elaborate rationalization whose real function is to support a predetermined taste; the character of the satisfaction which his contemplation of “the beautiful” produces is not such as he sees it and describes it—a sort of intimation of that beauty which lies beyond human apprehension—but instead a balm to wounded nerves; and while he is related to those French decadents who acknowledge to a greater extent than he does the psychological meaning of their temperaments, he creates for his works a different significance by inventing an aesthetic which assigns to them new values. Thus his criticism is not only an analysis of his own work but an analysis made by one who did not fully understand the genesis of the thing analyzed and was unconsciously eager to disguise its origin from himself as well as from others.

We have, then, traced Poe's art to an abnormal condition of the nerves and his critical ideas to a rationalized defense of the limitations of his own taste. We have also indicated that even as an interpretation of his own works his criticism falls short of psychological truth and it might seem that we had thus undertaken to destroy the value of his work. Such is far, however, from being the intention. The question whether or not the case of Poe represents an exaggerated example of the process by which all creation is performed is at least an open question. The extent to which all imaginative works are the result of the unfulfilled desires which spring from either idiosyncratic or universally human maladjustments to life is only beginning to be investigated, and with it is linked the related question of the extent to which all critical principles are at bottom the systematized and rationalized expression of instinctive tastes which are conditioned by causes often unknown to those whom they affect. The problem of finding an answer to these questions and of determining what effect, if any, the findings in any particular case should have upon the evaluation of the works of imagination or interpretation so produced is the one distinctly new problem which the critic of today is called upon to consider. He must, in a word, endeavor to find the relationship which exists between psychology and aesthetics.

Whatever a critic can convincingly read into a work may be said to be actually there, even though it be thought of as the creation of the critic rather than of the author criticized. And the works of Poe have his own interpretations of them as one of the various modes in which they exist. They have been read in the light of his intention and the effect which they have produced has been at least so modified by that intention as to be different from the effect which they would have produced had he and his readers been aware of the psychological processes behind them. That legend of himself which he fashioned in a manner so marvelously inclusive that it employs as material everything from the events of his daily life to the products of his imagination is finally completed by his interpretation. His criticism inscribes a curve within which everything else is included; it unifies all the various aspects of his life and work; and thus it makes his legend as a whole, rather than any of the individual stories or poems which are but a part of it, his supreme artistic creation.

In the Driftway

THERE is nothing more entertaining, it seems to the Drifter, than a gathering of people who have studied in the ancient city of Oxford, where one learns, as Stephen Leacock has put it, by being "smoked at." The Drifter had the good fortune recently to be present at such a gathering, and he has been smiling to himself ever since. Early in the evening, very early, the merits of every "pub" in and about Oxford were discussed with fine discrimination; and from there the conversation followed devious paths. The Drifter heard once more the story of the American student (imaginary) who wrote home that he had attended a dinner of brussels sprouts, "in honor of the heads of the colleges." There were also new tales of the old white-bearded scholars with colds in their heads who hover about the Bodleian, like ghosts of the past, their handkerchiefs knotted at the four corners and pulled over venerable heads in a feeble attempt to thwart the pitiless drafts of that bleak but excellent library. And the member of the group who had most recently visited the university reported how one of Mr. Woolworth's lurid ten-cent flowers had bloomed on the Corn.

* * * * *

BUT the most amusing story was reserved until the last. And the Drifter cannot resist passing it on. The tale relates how a great linoleum king tried to enter his son at Oxford. This king from somewhere in America, finding himself in London, decided that he should like to have his son, the crown prince, become a student at Oxford. He forthwith hired a magnificent Rolls Royce automobile and drove with his son to the university. From college to college the great car rolled. And each time the father and son came back from the college office empty-handed. Finally, in desperation, the ambitious father sought a fellow-countryman prominent in American circles at Oxford, and begged for help. The American student obligingly arranged for them an interview with the head of the college to which he himself belonged. The rector was a kindly old gentleman. He questioned the boy concerning his previous studies. Said the crown prince, "I have had mathematics, a little Latin, typewriting—and business English." The kindly gentleman reached for a book. "This," he said slowly, "is very easy Latin. I'm sure you can read it. I'd like to hear you translate this paragraph." The boy took the book—and there was a pause. "I—I don't know the first word," he said timidly. The rector obligingly told him what it was. Another long pause. "I—I don't know the second word." Again the rector helped him out. Still another, longer pause. The crown prince was getting nervous. "I—I don't know the third word." For the third time the rector told him the meaning of the word. The boy grew very nervous. "Sir," he said, "I know what it means—I'm sure I know what it means—but I can't put it into English exactly—" The old gentleman smiled kindly, helpfully. "Perhaps," he suggested, "you could put it into—business English."

Help Atlanta University

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the last number of The Nation W. E. Burghardt Du Bois explains the cause of the university's present crisis: "It early gave alumni representation on its board of trustees, and it insisted upon social equality between the races within the walls of the institution." It is nothing less than an indictment of the white race that only such institutions of learning as establish the same atmosphere of racial inequality within as is felt outside receive adequate financial support.

I have visited Atlanta University and I am glad to raise my voice with that of Arthur Twining Hadley and Ernest M. Hopkins as to the excellence of the work done there in the face of cruel handicaps and most discouraging limitations. Do not think that Atlanta University is too "highbrow" to teach practical subjects. Besides the courses leading to the academic degree, there is provision for the study of agriculture, printing, home making, and all kinds of manual training.

Among the graduates of the university are some of the most distinguished writers and social workers among the colored people. James Weldon Johnson, the poet and speaker; Walter White, the novelist and investigator, and Augustus Dill, business manager of the Crisis, are among its honored graduates, besides nine principals of public schools, 122 public-school teachers, many editors, physicians, principals of private schools, lawyers, bishops, deans of colleges, and three college presidents.

The crisis at the university is immediate. There are outstanding bills that cannot be paid until more funds are in the treasury. Thirty-one thousand dollars is needed for the current expenses for this year. Mrs. Rush, a representative of Atlanta University, has come to New York to describe the acute needs of her institution. Contributions may be sent to her at the 137th Street Branch of the Y. W. C. A., or to me at 12 East Eighty-sixth Street.

Christian Science Answers Professor Jastrow

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I shall appreciate an opportunity to correct certain erroneous statements regarding Christian Science and its discoverer and founder, Mary Baker Eddy, contained in Mr. Joseph Jastrow's review of the book entitled "The Faith, the Failure, and the Falsity of Christian Science," issued under the joint authorship of Woodbridge Riley, Frederick W. Peabody, and Dr. Charles E. Humiston, published in your issue of February 10. Mr. Jastrow, as an example, is mistaken in his assumption that the misleading article on Christian Science which Mr. Riley now gives to us in the volume under discussion was deleted from the Cambridge History of American Literature by its publishers, G. P. Putnam's Sons, at the instance of the Christian Science Church. The facts are that Putnam's, impelled by a genuine respect for decent womanhood, were unwilling that the imprint of their firm should be found upon an article the main purpose of which was to malign the character of one who was not here to defend herself. In a letter referring to this incident, Mr. Irving Putnam, of the firm of G. P. Putnam's Sons, wrote:

As soon as the article had been read by a member of our publishing board we decided that as publishers we would not stand for a chapter that was so outrageous in tone and contained such offensive references. We so announced our decision. The article on Christian Science and the article on the . . . were both canceled on our own initiative and new articles substituted in their place. These articles were not suppressed by reason of any demand or request of those outside of our office.

Following the rejection of his article by Putnam's, Mr. Riley found himself in the unhappy position of a disappointed author balked in the effort to vent his spleen against the Christian Science religion under the pretext of making an authoritative contribution to the history of American literature. This may account for the fact that he now passionately defends his sources of information without in the slightest degree weighing their value or dependability. Such procedure is hardly in keeping with the position Mr. Riley holds in the educational world.

The situation is somewhat similar with his collaborator Mr. Peabody, who, some twenty years ago, was unsuccessful in conducting a suit against Mrs. Eddy. He, too, is guilty of making statements without having competent evidence to support them.

The contribution of Dr. Humiston, the last of this literary trio, has been aptly characterized by one reviewer as "ludicrously unscientific," this reviewer adding: "Its assumption that an alleged system of healing can be proved a failure by a citation of seventy-one cases would make short work of the medical profession itself."

The authors of the book in question have advanced many theories regarding Christian Science which are entirely foreign to its practice and not to be found in its teachings. There is, for instance, no parallelism between Christian Science, Quimbyism, and the doctrine of Mr. Alcott; and no more is there any actual or pretended occult relation between practitioner and patient. Moreover, the use of will power and suggestion, to which reference is frequently made, is specifically prohibited in Christian Science practice. Christian Science with its system of spiritual healing is original with Mrs. Eddy, and our critics' efforts to trace its genealogy to sources other than the Bible, coupled with the implication that it was nurtured in occult mysticism, are the best possible proof that they have failed utterly to grasp the fundamentals of Mrs. Eddy's religious teachings. There is, of course, a similarity in the terminology employed by all writers on the subject of mental and spiritual healing. Messrs. Quimby and Alcott, for example, used terminology common to their day. Mrs. Eddy has done likewise. Aside from this, however, these systems of thought have nothing in common. As to Mr. Quimby's mode of treatment, I may say that he used physical manipulation and suggestion; while Mrs. Eddy relied wholly upon the prayer of spiritual understanding. To contend that such methods bear the slightest likeness to Christian Science treatment is but to betray one's total ignorance of the teachings and practice of this religion.

Despite a campaign of vilification there comes a time when an intelligent public turns to authoritative sources for its information regarding the character and work of great leaders and teachers. This is precisely what is happening today in connection with Mrs. Eddy and her manifold activities. Honest inquiry is revealing the fact that she is loved and respected by thousands both within and without the Christian Science movement. Many are also learning for the first time that Mrs. Eddy was not only highly esteemed by individual friends and acquaintances but on more than one occasion great governments and representative institutions conferred upon her without solicitation honors that her would-be traducers might seek in vain. The Victoria Institute of London, as an example, paid Mrs. Eddy the compliment of electing her an associate life member; while the French Government made her an Officer of the French Academy. This latter action was taken at the instance of M. Briand, present Premier of France. It is also noteworthy that Governor Samuel D. Felker of New Hampshire, her native State, said in a public address: "As Daniel Webster was the son of New Hampshire, so Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, the discoverer and founder of Christian Science, was first among the women of the Granite State. She has left the impress of her work not only on New England but on the entire world; and we are proud of her." On the same occasion Hon. Edwin C. Eastman, then attorney general of New Hampshire, stated: "I am glad to say that I have known Mrs. Eddy well, and I am very proud of her for her religious views and citizenship. I consider her the most remarkable woman, perhaps, that this country or any other country has produced."

In passing judgment on Mrs. Eddy and her efforts in behalf of mankind it should be remembered that for more than half a century the religious teachings and healing ministry founded by her have been subjected to the test of practical application; and all fair-minded people will measure the value of her work by its fruits rather than by the views of biased critics.

Modeler's Middle-Age

By LOUISE TOWNSEND NICHOLL

I will break my vases,
The mold I will break.
This is the last vase
I shall make.

I will have done with molding
This familiar stuff.
Vases are for holding;
Mine would not hold enough.

*Life is short and death is sure,
Man walks on the earth alone;
These are things would not come pure
Even if I worked in stone.*

*Love must always be unspoken,
Faith must come to its relief;
Mold and models must be broken
Now I know that life is brief.*

This last vase is nearly done;
By a wall across the street
Old men are sitting in the sun
With knowledge and defeat.

They drowse; but I have restless hands
Will keep me awake—
Thumbing out the vases
I shall never make.

First Glance

I FIRST became acquainted with Isabella Agneta Elizabeth de Zuylen, daughter of Diederik-Jacob van Tuyl, through the preposterous letter written to her by James Boswell in 1764 and printed by Mr. Tinker in his recent edition of Boswell's letters. Boswell, it seems, had met the young lady in Holland, had been fascinated perhaps by her beauty and certainly by her wit, and when he began to think about her had not known what to think. He went on to Berlin and wrote such a letter as a vain but gifted coxcomb would write when he felt forced to use his mind at last but did not know how. Condescension mingled with adoration, prudery with effrontery, and officiousness with affection to produce as ridiculous a missive as a woman could receive. Should he, could he, ask Zélide to be his wife? No and yes; and again no. He ended with some supremely foolish advice to go and be henceforth "rationally happy"; and we hear little more of Zélide until Boswell, back in Britain searching for a wife, suddenly remembers the lady of Zuylen and writes her that she may now have him; and gets a letter back which makes him ask his friend Temple if she is "not a termagant, or at least will she not be one by the time she is forty?" I was curious about Zélide, for I saw through the mist of her absurd lover a warm and brilliant woman. I could have gone to Sainte-Beuve or to the volumes by Philippe Godet. I waited; and I am rewarded with "The Portrait of Zélide" by Geoffrey Scott and "Four Tales by Zélide," translated by Sybil Scott (Scribner's: $3.75 each).

Zélide as we now have her is a discovery indeed. She is not merely, as Mr. Scott says in one of his many felicitous sentences, a woman "endowed by nature with a simple heart, a sensuous temperament, and a mind of amazing alacrity." She is not merely, as Mr. Scott almost too smoothly insists, the author of some tales which "fill a graceful if inconspicuous niche in the cold temple of eighteenth-century romance." She is a figure haunted by contradictions within and by disappointments without; and she is a writer of distinguished if minor proportions. Mr. Scott's "Portrait," while it already shows some of the tarnish which is gathering everywhere upon the silvered Temple of Strachey, beautifully gives us the character of this lively woman who, born by a freak of circumstances into the stupidest of aristocracies, deliberately married "a timid, phlegmatic, stammering, and mathematical man" and went to live in a world which she must have known would bore her even more. At Colombier, near Lausanne, "boredom became her muse." Relieved during two brief periods by love affairs with an unnamed person of Geneva and with Benjamin Constant, this boredom grew and flowered and inspired both the satire and the sentiment in her books—the books of a woman who could never decide between the simplicity which she had inherited and the wit which she had achieved. The "Four Tales" must speak for themselves. But they place Madame de Charrière, I think, in a safe place between Miss Austen and Madame de Staël.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Mystery of Poe

Edgar Allan Poe: A Study in Genius. By Joseph Wood Krutch. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

STRANGE though it may seem, this is the first book on Poe that offers anything approaching a rational and convincing account of him. His critics in the past, almost unanimously, have been diverted from the business by the fascinating phenomenon of his drunkenness. To some it has been a sinister external force, like smallpox or jury duty, dissuading him from his high concerns, and so crippling his genius. To others it has been the mainspring of his life, and proof sufficient of his unfitness to be admired by Christian men and women. Mr. Krutch, following a somewhat faint lead by Dr. John W. Robinson, puts it finally into its proper place. Poe was a drunkard intermittently and by orgy, as he was a bounder intermittently and by orgy. The habit was a symptom, not a cause, and even as a symptom it was trivial, though it brought him to the grave. Strapped to the water-wagon, with a ton of Bibles to hold him down, he would have been precisely the same Poe. He came into the world bearing bizarre stigmata, and the Weird Sisters fanned him in the cradle. The visible universe scarcely touched him. He inhabited a universe of his own, with red glares lighting it, implacable clouds hedging it round, and preposterous fauna roving its evil groves. He was, in his way, a patriotic citizen of it—what might be called a 100 per cent Fantastic. He delighted in its occult sins, its drug-store smells. But there were times, too, when he longed pathetically to get out of it, and now and then these longings took the form of overt flights. But always he was turned back. Always the world of fact rebuffed and terrified him, and he returned anew to his world of charnel-house dreams.

Mr. Krutch's study of him is full of shrewd observation and plausible speculation. The ordinary tests of literary criticism, of course, are not to be applied to Poe. He was sui generis—or he was simply a poor mountebank, and not worth studying. Mr. Krutch finds, however, that psychology can account for him. His complexes were genuinely complex, but nevertheless they fit into the categories. More, they flow naturally out of the circumstances of his unstable youth: the dreadful death of his mother, his equivocal and painful position in the house of the Allans, his humiliating difficulties at the University of Virginia, his service as a common soldier, his abject poverty. All of his early life was a struggle against inferiorities. He saw himself as one distinguished and superior; the reality brought him very near to the gutter. Mr. Krutch believes that even his first literary enterprises were no more than parts of his general flight mechanism. He turned to the pen as to a sort of surrogate for the lost sword of the Virginia cavalier, snatched from his hand by Allan. He would show the cock-eyed world! And when genius alone failed to amaze it, he resorted readily to gaudy lying. Thus his grandfather, the lowly profiteer, became a hero of the Revolution. And thus he himself became a mysterious political agent in Russia, and a comrade of Byron in Greece.

It was his mother's death, penniless and among not too friendly strangers, that left the deepest mark upon him. It not only made him a fugitive from a too cruel world; it also made him incapable of ordinary human love. His marriage was so preposterous as to be almost pathological. Virginia Clemm was a child scarcely come to adolescence; moreover, she was next door to an idiot. Mr. Krutch believes that Poe married her as a device of safety. So long as she was there he was secure, to that extent, against other women. Her incapacity as wife did not daunt him. It was, indeed, her incapacity as wife that chiefly attracted him, for in women as sexual objects he took no interest. There is no hint of carnal love in any of his stories; he was a Parsifal if there ever was one on this earth. When, toward the end of his own life, Virginia died, his affairs of the heart at once took on a grotesque and impossible character. He engaged himself to several women at once, and most of them were fantastic blue-stockings, as devoid of sexual charm as so many lady embalmers. Women stirred him only when they were in decay, and even then they did not stir his hormones. His heroines all suffer from phagocytolysis, and he approaches them on his knees.

Mr. Krutch shows clearly how vain is the effort to detach Poe from his work, or his work from Poe. The man simply poured himself into his writings. They have only the remotest sort of contact with anything external to his own singular personality. They are full of the strange horrors that beset him; there is little in them else. The effort to pigeon-hole them, carried on for years by humorless professors, is manifestly vain. There was only one Poe, and the tragic turmoil within him was his beginning and his end. In certain moods all of us can understand him; in other moods even his fondest partisans must find him only absurd. The man wrote abominably. Some of his most celebrated stories are done in a Johnsonese that would have disgraced the late Mr. Harding. His criticism, for all its acumen, is couched mainly in bombast. His poetry is popular in proportion as it justifies Emerson's sneer: to wit, that it consists of jingles. But Poe himself remains. There is something titanic in his tragedy. It breaks through his ornate and rococo sentences; it overwhelms his nonsensical theories and idle pedantries; it gives an austere dignity to even his worst jingles. It will always bring a crowd to his booth—a crowd fascinated and yet a bit uneasy. There have been far greater artists, but there have been few more glamorous men.

Mr. Krutch has done a good job. His book is devoid of the snuffling that has marked all Poe criticism in the past. It shows a complete mastery of the known facts, and a fine capacity for getting order into them, and penetrating to their meaning. He has his moments of boldness. When the record is a blank, as it is only too often, he sometimes permits himself an ingenious guess. But there is no dogmatic theorizing in him; he never descends to the mere arguing of a case. His study, I believe, is the most intelligent and convincing account of Poe ever written.

H. L. MENCKEN

Senator Crane of Massachusetts

W. Murray Crane, A Man and a Brother. By Solomon Bulkley Griffin. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

THIS is a revealing book about Senator Crane of Massachusetts by an intimate journalistic and personal friend. It has a great theme. Senator Crane was undoubtedly one of the most important statesmen in our recent history. Chauncey M. Depew, as quoted in this book, rightly called him the Senate's most influential member. It is therefore regrettable that Mr. Griffin does not give us a larger analysis of the immense national issues which Mr. Crane faced and a larger analysis also of the reasons why Mr. Crane adopted the policies which earned for him, in the estimation of the Left Wing of American politics, the "bad eminence" of being regarded as the blackest feather in the Right Wing.

The book, however, is delightfully local. It is primarily interested in Mr. Crane as a neighbor in Berkshire County. It dwells at some length on Mr. Crane's deep interest in Berkshire County's cemeteries. It charmingly shows us Mr. Crane, at the age of seventeen, sweeping the floors of his ancestral paper factory and sorting rags in its rag-room and pounding out pieces of paper on a wooden block with a mallet. It charmingly and even touchingly recounts Mr. Crane's innumerable subsequent benefactions, not only of money but also of time and of personal interest and friendliness, to his neighbors in Berkshire County. It totally demonstrates—all over again—the indubitable historic personal kindness and tenderness of this acclaimed and attacked leader of the "black forces of reaction."

Then, by a certain exercise and stretch of Berkshire County imagination, the author gets as far as Boston and gives a really excellent account of Mr. Crane's administration of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts when he was its governor. Incidentally it may be noted that Mr. Griffin, in this part of his book, relates numerous occasions when Mr. Crane, as governor of Massachusetts, earnestly and successfully resisted certain legislative measures vehemently demanded by powerful Massachusetts financial interests. Here one thinks that Mr. Griffin will begin to develop some sort of reasoned rescue of Mr. Crane from the charge subsequently brought against him of being the senatorial agent of the whole country's financial interests. But not at all! As soon as Mr. Crane not only leaves Berkshire County but even leaves Massachusetts and goes actually to the District of Columbia Mr. Griffin's interest in the details and motives of his behavior notably dwindles. This book is authentically and magnificently English and New English. It thinks that the most important thing about a man is what he does in his own countryside. If he is all right there, he is presumably all right at the national capital; and so why bother too much about the details? He was a good man. Therefore we know he did the right thing.

In any case, so far as being good is concerned, there is absolutely no doubt that Mr. Crane was not only negatively so but also superlatively positively so. His enormous financial generosity would in itself prove nothing; but it was accompanied by an almost incredible expenditure of his valuable personal time and of his frail physical strength. To this reviewer's knowledge he would go over three times a week from Washington to Baltimore, in the very midst of the most harassing political anxieties, to see somebody who was ill in a hospital; and once, when a poor man was killed in a street-car accident and when Mr. Crane did not know either the man or his widow but nobody wanted to break the news to the widow, Mr. Crane, the leader of the United States Senate, went out and did it.

But what was his political and economic philosophy? What were the reasons, what were the arguments, for it? On that point the book sheds no light.

Nevertheless it has one great political value. It does shed light on the present President of the United States. Mr.

Coolidge admittedly was prize boy in the Murray Crane Massachusetts political school. He was prefect in the sixth form and then he was the school's most successful and distinguished graduate. Mr. Griffin shows that Murray Crane still lives in the character of his most reverent pupil. In the foreword Mr. Coolidge states that Mr. Crane was "in each instance better equipped than anyone else to formulate plans which would meet the acceptance of the majority. . . . He had a broader comprehension of American life, reaching from the humblest fireside through all the various activities of the business and political world, than any other man of his time."

So what were Mr. Crane's outstanding practical political ideas? The first was governmental economy. Mr. Crane made it his main issue as governor of Massachusetts. Mr. Coolidge made it his main issue as President of the United States. The second was silence. Mr. Crane virtually never made any speeches or even any motions in the Senate. He simply flitted from side to side of the Senate central aisle and ultimately had his way. Mr. Coolidge has departed a bit from this example and maxim, but nevertheless a large part of his original claim to public favor was that he was "Silent Cal." The third and greatest outstanding political characteristic of Mr. Crane's was that he intensely favored the League of Nations. Mr. Coolidge has already taken us into the League Court. Watch now for Mr. Coolidge's final consummation of this most vital chapter in Mr. Crane's teachings!

In conclusion, it is to be noted that the book is in one more respect most thoroughly English and New English. It admirably and most entertainingly abounds in descriptions of Mr. Crane's outward personal behavior. It does no psychoanalysis of Mr. Crane. It never strips one veil away from Mr. Crane's soul. That was Mr. Crane's affair. For this relief, Mr. Griffin, much thanks. But to write another book which, besides giving us Mr. Crane's personal endearing activities, will give us more largely Mr. Crane's national political times.

WILLIAM HARD

The World Well Lost?

The Plumed Serpent. By D. H. Lawrence. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.
Reflections on the Death of a Porcupine. By D. H. Lawrence. Centaur Press. $4.

THE world has been too much for D. H. Lawrence, and so he has left the world and gone through a fog in search of the dark gods. He sees mankind more and more like a nest of scorpions devouring one another in a horrid industry. No matter where he goes he finds neither god nor man, but only preying insects. Democracy and modern education creep like a slime toward the farthest rim of the sky, and perhaps only in savage peoples and mystics does Mr. Lawrence discover the pure flame of life burning like a star in a dark gulf. In "Kangaroo" he went shuddering through the dusty warrens of Australian democracy, and now, in "The Plumed Serpent," he stands limed in the ooze of decadence and tyranny enveloping modern Mexico. He must do something to keep himself from going mad; and so he has the nobler Mexicans and the Indians set up a new worship of Quetzalcoatl, and find refuge and a valiant life in a religion compounded of mysticism and a direct appeal to arms.

When any novelist casts out the world he casts out likewise his passion for men and women just as men and women. His characters lose all aspect of a common humanity and take on the monstrous contours of saviors and demons. The novel sheds flesh and blood and is nailed down like the frame of a prophecy on a rack where the novelist lies shrieking. Words hover in a golden cloud and dim shapes pretend to be men and women acting from their own nature, but all the while you hear the voice of the prophet, from whose body his characters float like wraiths charged with a voice not their own but lent them for a planned purpose. For many years H. G. Wells has been putting on false faces and pretending to invent new characters. For his latest books D. H. Lawrence has worn disguises so thin that not even the supposed characters seem at all convinced of their own reality.

Who can ever forget Gudrun and Ursula in "The Rainbow" and "Women in Love," or the girl in "A Fragment of Stained Glass," or Hannele in "The Captain's Doll," or George in "The White Peacock"? By the same token who cares anything whatever about the men and women in "Kangaroo" and "The Plumed Serpent"? An author is most truly himself by being his characters; but when his characters are not themselves by being the author you will exclaim at the gorgeous style and the astounding eloquence and the persuasive doctrine, but you do not care what happens to anyone. In any other case it might not matter in the least. In the case of Mr. Lawrence it matters as much as if Wagner had kept on writing metaphysics instead of writing "Götterdämmerung," and Lewis Carroll had rejected the Mad Hatter for a surd.

There can be no denying that in both "The Plumed Serpent" and the essays bound together in "Reflections on the Death of a Porcupine" Mr. Lawrence writes and talks like a god. There are passages of miraculous wonder and words like arrows tipped with light borrowed from the sun. He has all his old infallible and inexhaustible knowledge of woman's nature and his Indians bear all the fascination of an alien life perfectly understood. It is just because there is no Lawrence but Lawrence that many of us hate his missionary zeal and his metaphysical divinations even where we most agree with his hate of the festering ooze. Once he had a magic wand that struck living waters from the rock of the soul whose true nature lies hid in an inner darkness shielded by the basalt covering of conscious knowledge. Now the divining-rod in "Aaron's Rod" is too often used in beating scorpions and measuring the limitations of society. It is too bad that some invincible need stops Mr. Lawrence from the practice so intelligently expounded in his essay on the novel. He is a sorcerer of the first order. He has no business binding himself over as an apprentice to a prophet.

Why did Mr. Lawrence find it necessary to read so many books on the subconscious and (it is suggested in all respect) why did he get himself so firmly married? He did all his best work before he went in heavily for studying philosophies and letting science tell him in just what exact way he had explained the subliminal. It has made him too self-conscious, and his present desire to slay the dragon of the world has likewise put the self-conscious in place of the subconscious. No one forced Dostoevski to hang himself before he created the character of Stavrogin, who hangs himself; and why has Mr. Lawrence got to know so clearly just what he is about? I defy him to tell me what he was about in "A Fragment of Stained Glass" and "The Thorn in the Flesh," except to create a masterpiece contained in its own being. It may be added that his marriage, too, has made him dreadfully self-conscious about marriage and led him into tedious reptilian lectures like the chapter on marriage in "Kangaroo" and the wives in "Kangaroo" and "The Plumed Serpent" who have no reason for living in the same world with Ursula and Gudrun.

No amount of advice can save any artist from his own nature. No one can come hurrying like a bright Perseus to rescue Andromeda from the dragon. An artist is bound to his own nature like a man tied to a rock. If you tear and break the rock you destroy the man whose brain and heart have grown from the rock. Writers like Mr. Wells and Mr. Lawrence must follow the course prescribed by an inner necessity. There is not much use, after all, in standing off like small boys and throwing pebbles at the dragon because we don't like his fifth or twenty-fifth skin. A peddler of fiction can wear the colors of the chameleon and do tricks; but a chameleon isn't a dragon. The crooked roads which cannot be made straight are the roads of genius.

DONALD DOUGLAS

W. T. Stead

The Life and Letters of W. T. Stead. By Frederic Whyte. Houghton Mifflin Company. Two volumes. $12.

H. WICKHAM STEED, the present editor of the Review of Reviews, has received, he tells us, more than one suggestion from "hard-headed" business men that it would be of advantage to that magazine if the words "Founded by W. T. Stead" were deleted from its title-page. "Hard-headed" business men indeed! "Wooden-headed" is surely the epithet that would suit them most precisely. As well might The Nation blush to recall the name of Godkin. For the mere memory of Stead's association with it is enough to confer upon any enterprise a rare and perpetual distinction. But this stupid self-exposure of the commercial mind shows how desirable it was that there should be no longer any delay in the preparation of an adequate account of Stead's career. Mr. Whyte has grappled with a big task and has achieved it successfully. Henceforth there will be no excuse for any one to lift a superior nose at the mention of the greatest English journalist of his time.

When Lord Northcliffe died, many of the obituary notices spoke of him as the pioneer of the New Journalism. That description might be more justly applied to W. T. Stead, in so far, at any rate, as the new journalism was an improvement on the old. Long before Alfred Harmsworth came to Fleet Street Stead had emancipated the London press from its stodginess and conventionality and infused into it a vitality that it had hitherto lacked. At the same time there was a conspicuous difference between his journalism and the Northcliffe type. Not a year passed without his accomplishing many "stunts" that set everybody talking. But Stead never attempted a stunt for the stunt's sake. His stunts were all crusades. They were inspired not by any eagerness for an increase in circulation and consequently in advertising revenue but by an utterly unworldly passion for the achievement of some end which was to promote the welfare of his fellow-men. As he once put it himself, his purpose was to give a "soul" to sensational journalism. After all, Stead was not primarily a journalist in the ordinary sense. Essentially he was a preacher, and he became a journalist simply because the newspaper, rather than the pulpit of any church, offered him in these days the best opportunity of spreading his message. Behind his denunciations and appeals there was an unspoken "Thus saith the Lord." Whenever I wish to envisage to myself a Hebrew prophet, I can do so more clearly by means of my recollections of Stead than by looking at Abbey's mural paintings in the Boston Library.

One had hardly realized how numerous and varied were these crusades of Stead's until the story of them came to be told consecutively in these volumes. So many-sided were his enthusiasms that readers of narrower interests will be apt to think Mr. Whyte has paid insufficient attention to the particular phase of Stead's career that happened to attract their own sympathies. To those who were in the thick of that controversy thirty-two pages, for instance, might seem a meager allowance for an account of his campaign against the iniquity and folly of the Transvaal War. The fact is that it would need an encyclopedia rather than a biography to do justice to the record of a man who was in vital touch with so many altruistic projects in all parts of the world. Mr. Whyte has to content himself with a bare mention of Stead's labors in some causes which, in the case of most biographies, would have provided material for whole chapters or sections—his efforts on behalf of postal reform, his support of the progressives in London municipal politics, his frustrated endeavors to found a "Civic Church," and so on. There were also enterprises of his, outside journalism proper, which were of such value and importance that they would have sufficed to make a name for most men, but which appear so slight in comparison with Stead's main services to his generation that they are almost forgotten. He was the most powerful pamphleteer since Defoe. And who can estimate the contribution he made to the popularizing of the best literature by the issue of more than five million copies of his "Penny Poets"? Yet this was a mere by-product of his constant activity, and hardly comes to one's mind when one recalls his career. Few people, again, ever think of Stead as a public speaker. Although he had chosen to express himself through the newspaper and the magazine, there were occasions when—being a crusader first of all and only secondarily a newspaper man—he readily availed himself of the opportunities offered him by the platform. Mr. Whyte quotes a page or two of the impressions left by him on some of his hearers, but he might have said much more on this point. Actually there were not half a dozen of his contemporaries, even among those whose reputation rested mainly on their eloquence, whose addresses would so well satisfy the tests of effective oratory.

Measured by actual achievement, no journalist in the history of the British press has left behind him a record to equal W. T. Stead's. Yet it was his personality—his alertness, his unselfishness, his courage, his tenderness—of which one thinks first and foremost today. And most of those who knew him will agree with the conclusion of his biographer: "My own impression is that Stead will be remembered rather for what he was than for any of the things he did: that he will figure in history as the bravest and most brilliant of all English journalists and as perhaps the most extraordinary man ever seen in Fleet Street."

HERBERT W. HORWILL

Experimentalist Christianity

The Religion of Yesterday and Tomorrow. By Kirsopp Lake. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

MODERNISM in America has laid itself open to the charge of unduly befogging questions of great moment. For instance, What is the relation of the modernist to the creeds and customs of the church? How far can reinterpretation be carried with intellectual integrity? In what sense does the advanced religious liberal justify his claim to be a Christian? In the book before us Professor Lake faces these problems in candid and brilliant fashion.

His fundamental contention is that "continuity, not consistency, makes it [Christianity] one and the same, and continuity means neither invariable thought nor identical experience but men's unbroken consent to live and work together. . . . Christianity has changed more than most religions because it has had a higher and intenser vitality." These changes Mr. Lake reviews rapidly with sympathetic insight into the values of various shapes or forms of Christianity. He then makes an illuminating classification of Protestants, not into fundamentalists and modernists but into fundamentalists, institutionalists, and experimentalists. The fundamentalist holds fast to the infallible inspiration of the Scriptures and—usually—to the creeds. "At his best he is an enthusiast, at his worst, an ignoramus." The institutionalist is interested less in thought than in the institution; he endeavors to reduce to a minimum the amount of "opinion" that must be accepted, and he seeks to use the old language to express new meanings. "At his worst he is an ecclesiastical huckster, and he is never a prophet; . . . at his best he is a statesman who understands the minds of men and a priest who has looked deep into their souls."

The experimentalist adopts the position "familiar to the scientist, that experiment is the basis of knowledge." Two great experiments in life are the basis of religion. The first is made "when a man is conscious that there is a purpose in life of which he is only a part but with which he can co-operate if he choose, and he does choose." The second is made

"when a man is conscious that there is a source of life which imparts help to him when he is weak, comfort when he is in sorrow, and purification when he has sinned. . . . For the Western world the natural laboratories for religion are the Christian churches." The experimentalist at his worst "is a sentimentalist, slack in conduct and inaccurate in thought; at his best he is a prophet."

As an experimentalist believing that the religion of the future lies with experimentalism, Professor Lake considers the probable attitude of experimentalism toward the Bible and the creeds, God and prayer, Jesus and the church. The Bible is valuable as a record of religious discovery, not of inspiration. The creeds may be retained "as part of an uplifting and inspiring liturgy" but must be abandoned "as statements of thought." (Just why categorical statements of fact or opinion which Professor Lake utterly rejects are liturgically valuable remains to this reviewer a mystery not helped by Mr. Lake's comparison of them to a great cathedral.) The experimentalist regards Jesus as a great but not a perfect figure. He does not pretend to follow Him closely, but he thinks "the path which he treads and the light which he sees would not be disowned by Jesus." Prayer as petition must be rejected in a world of law; as "communion and aspiration" it has its place. Truth, beauty, and wisdom are real; they are values, and "God is all the values taken together." He—or It—is also Purpose—an assumption which Professor Lake does not attempt to prove and which, unlike the apprehension of truth or beauty, the mystic does not usually claim to establish by his own processes.

The future church will be stripped of many of its present tasks and aims. It will help men to see "the glory of truth and the splendor of beauty." It will "afford a center toward which mystics may turn." Professor Lake admits that between such a conception of Christianity and fundamentalism there can be no compromise, but elsewhere he says that if he were omnipotent he "should not attempt to expel either the fundamentalists or the institutionalists." (On his own showing he gives the fundamentalists little reason for not expelling him.)

With all its humor, insight, and feeling—qualities to which this summary does scant justice—one may doubt whether the book will convince many Christians that they ought to be experimentalists or many experimentalists that they ought to stay within the Christian church, where certainly they are not generally welcomed. Experimentalists, in Professor Lake's sense, may with almost equal logic have a Jewish, Christian, Buddhist, Hindu, or even a Moslem background. Why, then, maintain the Christian emphasis? As a matter of fact, how many people want their religion to be experimental rather than authoritarian? Most men want from religion comfort and assurance. Not many of them are capable of finding either in Professor Lake's combination of Christian aesthetics, semi-Platonic philosophy, and modern science unbuttressed by any "Thus saith the Lord." Yet he has done us all—and not least the various groups of modernists—a great service by this absorbingly interesting discussion of the eternal problem of religion. And to those who share his point of view he has given a brilliant philosophic defense which they must welcome.

Books in Brief

Expansionists of 1812. By Julius W. Pratt. The Macmillan Company. $2.

This is another contribution to the history of the American frontier, devoted to showing that the War of 1812, instead of being waged, as the "older historians" have commonly urged, to redress the grievances of the seaboard States over British depredations upon their commerce, was rather a war of expansion in which frontier sentiment was the driving force. Professor Pratt's examination of political opinion in the various States, from New Hampshire to Georgia, convinces him that

The Employment of Young Persons in the United States. New York: National Industrial Conference Board. $1.50.

This is a well-organized and fairly comprehensive summary of data derived from the U. S. Census of Occupations and various surveys of employed children. The data are neither new nor original, but in some mysterious way their publication by the N. I. C. B. gives them authenticity—for certain purposes. What we need more than facts and figures about child employment is a better idea of child labor. Child employment and child labor may coincide in many respects and in many instances, but they are two separate categories. We should start with the child, his nature and needs. An approach solely from the occupational side involves the practically endless task of classifying all the variable jobs and occupations in which children engage; regards the job or occupation as the only determining factor in child labor, thus ignoring individual differences in children; and assumes that an obviously harmful effect must be found before child labor is predicated.

Endimion and Phoebe. Ideas Latmus. By Michael Drayton.

Edited by J. William Hebel. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

A beautiful edition of a poem which is not to be found in any collected edition of Drayton and which has never been accessible to the ordinary reader. Amy Lowell discusses it at some length as a possible source for Keats; her deductions may now be tested with pleasure and ease.

Art

Marc Chagall

DEVOUT Hegelians who firmly believe that all things dreamt and undreamt of in philosophy develop under the aegis of the dialectic trinity—thesis, antithesis, synthesis—should find great comfort in the career of Marc Chagall, for it corroborates this belief with curious exactitude. Chagall passed from sentimental imaginative realism (Vitebsk, before 1910) through a frenzied and fantastic expressionism (Paris, 1910-1914) to a modified combination of both (Vitebsk and Moscow, 1914-1922).

Chagall's quaint autobiographic notes speak with pious eloquence of the early years he passed in provincial Vitebsk eagerly watching the mixed population of peasant and peddler, merchant and mendicant trudge along from store to teashop, barber-shop, church, or synagogue. Chagall began with a simple portrayal of his immediate environment (Birth, Wedding, Death). A certain native sense of the grotesque made its appearance occasionally, but was kept well under restraint.

All restraint was discarded with Chagall's arrival in Paris (1910). The subdued grays, browns, and dull blues of his early period gave way to a riot of spectral colors clothing a phantasmagoria in which the laws of the physical world were abolished and normal logic had no place. Animals, men, and objects were dissected, made transparent, turned topsyturvy, and sent flying about (The Village and I, The Cattle Dealer, The Drunken Soldier). This was Chagall's peculiar reaction to cubism, then in its prime. Like the cubists, Chagall dissected objects—not, however, to arrive at abstraction, but rather to reach greater concreteness, to single out certain details for special emphasis. Chagall has never lost contact with the physical world, although the mirror which he holds up to nature has properties that make all reflection extremely weird.

In 1914 Chagall made arrangements for exhibitions in Holland and Germany and took what he intended to be a short trip to Russia. The war kept him there until 1922. During this period, while his paintings abroad were gaining him European fame, he worked on a new series of paintings which showed again a decided transformation. In them was united the reverence of his Vitebsk years with the sophistication gained in Paris (The Jew at Prayer, Above Vitebsk, The Green Jew). To be sure some extravagances still persisted—Chagall could not organically resist them—but their symbolism was now more easily comprehensible. In 1922 Chagall came to Berlin, and in 1923 to Paris, where he is living still. His most recent exhibition was held at the Reinhardt Galleries, New York.

An analysis of Chagall's entire work shows that, contrary to common practice among modernists who stress the formal at the expense of the thematic aspect of their work, Chagall gives equal attention to both. Two formative influences are directly responsible for this practice: Vitebsk and Paris. Vitebsk circumscribed the scope of his talent and served as the source of its themes; Paris gave it direction and determined its amplitude. Chagall's paintings are autobiographic. In the aggregate they form a sort of synoptic panorama of his experiences in which the shift between the real and the symbolic is bewilderingly sudden. Despite a cosmopolitan gloss the provincial anecdotist is always in evidence, in love with bright color and spicy anecdote. His paintings invariably tell a story which while always engaging is not always clear. One day some ambitious Freudian, applying to Chagall's work the method employed by Freud himself in "Leonardo da Vinci," will doubtless track many a complex to its lair. In the meantime Chagall's pictorial qualities alone are sufficient to insure a thorough enjoyment of his work. His color is used chiefly not as an aid in the representation of form but as a means in the evocation of its charm. Greater attention is paid to the interrelation of colors among themselves than to their correspondence to nature, making thus possible a great enrichment in the quality of the medium. Upon a closer acquaintance with Chagall's work, his weird antics, instead of puzzling, only enhance the charm of a fascinating story told with superb skill.

LOUIS LOZOWICK

Drama Hard Facts

BEHIND Mr. John Howard Lawson's new play, "Nirvana" (Greenwich Village Theater), as behind so many modern expressions of discontent, lies the commonplace fact that the intellect of man adjusts itself much more readily than do his emotions to all the changes which go on in the world he inhabits. Science, if it has not created a new world, has at least destroyed the old, and to many at least it seems that we do nothing except wander, emotionally, among the ruins. Mentally it may not be difficult to grasp the fact that God is dead and that with Him has passed away a whole universe of emotional realities, but the Soul—and the very necessity for employing this word is a sufficient indication of the inadequacy of our adjustment to a godless universe—demands without being able to find something satisfactory to herself in the meaningless world of which science describes the disjointed fragments. The mind leaps, and leaps perhaps with a sort of joy, through the immensities of space, but the spirit, frightened and cold in the vast emptiness, longs to have once more above its head that inverted bowl beyond which may lie whatever paradise its desires create; and in this fact is to be found a type of the agonies which afflict it. Man qua thinker may delight in the intricacies of psychology, but man qua lover has, at least, not learned to feel in its terms. Hormones and complexes, ductless glands and infantile impressions may serve to describe the feelings of another, but one's own demand all those symbols of the ineffable in which one has long ago ceased to believe.

Time was when the scientist, the poet, and the philosopher walked hand in hand. In the universe which the one perceived the other found himself comfortably at home, and there in fact rather than in any absence of conflict between the dogmas of religion and the conclusions of science lay the significance of the so-called synthesis achieved in other ages. But today when new facts pour in more rapidly than any mind can arrange them into a pattern men are obliged to live in realms between which no communication can be established. When the physician in his laboratory, "doing card tricks with God's creation," has found the solution of his problem at the end of a dissected nerve he has done no more than exasperate with another indigestible fact the artist who is exploring the realm of emotional realities. And the scientist in every man is equally at odds with the poet who is also a part of him. To the doctor who asks as the doctor in Mr. Lawson's play does: "Why all this pother about sex; the act is no more important than shaking hands and generally a good deal less cordial?" he can give no wholly satisfactory reply, but the fact is no help to that side of him which demands that the act in question be surrounded with spiritual significance. Compelled to feel and yet unable to respect his feelings, he mocks and he suffers.
